NOTHING helps quite so much to make the home attractive during the winter as bright, clean, fresh curtains and hangings. It is easy to wash them as often as necessary, and without injury to the most delicate materials, if you use Ivory Soap.

Ivory Soap does not shrink, fade, rot or stain them. Color and texture are the same after every washing as before it. And they are as fresh, clean, soft and pleasing as can be.

Ivory Soap has been used for cleaning perishable fabrics and for all particular household purposes since 1879—forty years. Its freedom from alkali and all other harsh materials, its whiteness, its thick, lasting lather, its freedom from excess oil and its all-round superior quality make it suitable for any work which cannot be entrusted to ordinary soap.

The greatest transport in the world, the U. S. S. Leviathan, arriving in New York on December 16 with over 8,000 soldiers and sailors from "Over There" steady flow of transports is sailing in, bearing brave boys back from the battlefields overseas, every one is joyously welcomed by shrieking tles and cheering thousands.

a transport approaches the Battery, the windows e tall office buildings and the Custom House are nly filled with groups of men and women waving handkerchiefs to the men on the decks e troopers, and multitudes hurry to vantage on the water front and the ferry boats. The ing, shrieking welcome keeps up until the trans- is docked.

e happy boys on board the transports are even more unrestrained in their demonstrations of joy at their return to their homeland. The sight of the Statue of Liberty, standing serenely in the midst of the bay, sets them wildly cheering and as they come within sound of the cheers from shore they respond with all their lung power and in unison in shouts and snatches of song. They madly wave their hands; their hats, their coats; many wave their crutches; they leap upon one another's shoulders and make grotesque gestures; they stand on their heads and kick their feet; it is a delirium of joyous expression. That many are wounded and sick does not dampen their ardor, for the sick and wounded are gladdest of all to be home.

America's entire available ocean shipping is being put into the service of bringing back the soldiers. A semi-official statement has it that 850,000 will come back early in the year. President Wilson in France has taken a personal part in pushing the arrangements. Many hundreds of thousands may be needed for police service in Europe for an indefinite period, but the latest plan is to complete the homeward movement by Christmas, 1919, if possible.

Up to December 15, 5,653 officers and 135,262 men of the Expeditionary Forces had been designated for return, and of these 1,373 officers and 30,750 men had sailed for home. It was but the beginning. Since middle December the shiploads are coming faster and faster.

Satisfactory arrangements have been perfected with the French authorities to cease cancelling the charters of ships intended to carry home American troops.

As a result of conferences between Edward N. Hurley, chairman of the American Shipping Board, and General Pershing, plans have been perfected whereby about 1,000,000 tons of shipping now used to supply the American Army in France, will soon be released for American trade.

MORE than 150,000 tons of shipping are now lying at American docks, and the need of providing for the products of American factories, which have turned from a wartime to a peace basis and which must have a bridge of ships to the world market, has made some move necessary.

A division of tonnage has been arranged so as to give preference to European relief, the return of American troops and commercial business, in the order named.

American shipping authorities in Paris have been advised that much tonnage which was expected to be used in carrying home Canadian and Australian troops may possibly be diverted to American needs, as those dominions are not planning to return their soldiers very quickly.

The American authorities are pressing for control of German passenger ships tied up in Hamburg and other ports, so that they also may be used in bringing home American troops.

The total capacity of passenger ships now at the disposal of the American Government will permit the return home of about 100,000 men a month. If the German passenger ships can be obtained it is estimated that this number can be increased to 150,000 men monthly. According to the best estimate the entire American army unless events should dictate some other plan should be home in a year.

Demobilization of the military forces in the home camps is also proceeding rapidly and approximately half of these 1,700,000 men are designated for early discharge. Reports of the War Department indicate a rate of discharge from the home camp of about 15,000 men a day, and this rate will soon be doubled.

Following a grand review by Secretary of the Navy Daniels of the returned American battle fleet in the harbor of New York, welcoming our naval heroes, it is reported from London that the Admiralty proposes that a large part of the British fleet, commanded by Admiral Sir David Beatty, shall visit the United States and that the fleet shall then proceed to visit all the British Dominions. No date for the visit has been fixed, but it is understood that it will be made immediately after peace has been signed.

The President's First Week in France

MADE a citizen of Paris, recognized by the press of the continent as the greatest figure in the Peace Conference, almost in fact as the guardian of the world's conscience, President Wilson, beginning on December 16, put in a busy and apparently profitable week in the capital of France. With his customary Wilsonian disregard of convention he began by breaking two precedents. He called on Premier Clemenceau at the Ministry of War just as any other citizen might have done, and accepted a dinner invitation of the Earl of Derby, British Ambassador to France. It is customary for Ministers of State to wait upon visiting sovereigns, and for heads of state to be entertained by those of like rank. The President showed both his good sense and his democracy in his disregard of tradition which might have bound his hands and thus have prevented him from gaining access to sources of information of great value.

After a trip by automobile to Versailles, the President and Mrs. Wilson, on December 16, went to the Hôtel de Ville, where the President was made a citizen of Paris, and received the great gold medal of the city from Adrian Mithouard, the President of Municipal Council. With true French tact M. Mithouard recognized the presence of Mrs. Wilson as adding charm and grace to the occasion, paying a glowing tribute to her devotion and her activity in works of mercy. Turning to the President he declared that the capital welcomed him with deep emotion to the cradle of French liberty as the eminent statesman of the Union and citizen of the world, whose voice, heard before the coming of victory, called to life the oppressed among the nations. The President, in reply, depicted the deep sympathy of the people of the United States for the sufferings of France and declared that the United States had been brought into the war because it had been deeply moved by the wrongs committed by the enemy, and had been convinced that the purposes of the Central Empires were wrong and must be resisted by men everywhere who loved liberty. He declared that whatever influence he exercised, or with whatever authority he spoke, he derived both from the people of the United States, and that in participating in the war "we have merely established our right to the full fellowship of those peoples throughout the world who reverenced the right of general liberty and justice."

A correspondent reported that the frequent appearance of the President in the streets of Paris was teaching the French how to cheer, and that his expressions since his first address on December 14 had brought Paris to realize his complete sympathy with both the sufferings and aspirations of the people of France.

The President was reported to have gone to France without a definite program as to the working out of his fourteen principles. The first three days of his stay in Paris were said to have resulted, through the conferences which he held with representatives of all of the Allied powers, in a much better understanding of his principles by the Allied statesmen and a much closer approach to a definite program for the conference. French politicians who had felt an anxiety that Wilson might try to dictate peace were reported to be assured by his statements and his presence, while British statesmen who had been disturbed by his statements regarding freedom of the seas were beginning to discover that American purposes were not in conflict with those of Britain.

On December 17 the American Ambassador, Wm. G. Sharp, entertained at dinner in honor of the Presidents of America and France. The guests included the French Cabinet, Marshals Joffre and Foch, the American delegation to the Peace Conference, Gen. Pershing and Gen. Bliss. At the reception following the dinner many notables of all nations were present. The 17th was a rainy day and Mr. Wilson spent the morning in his study instead of at golf, as he had planned. During the day a number of conferences with representatives of various Allies continued the President's policy of preparation for the Peace Congress. The American Peace Commission was busy getting its offices in shape, and it was declared that the President and Allied leaders were gradually formulating a program to lay before the first session of the conference early in January.

It was announced on December 18 that Premier Lloyd George would not go to France to meet President Wilson, but that President Wilson would visit England shortly after Christmas. The correspondents reported President Wilson and Premier Clemenceau to have discovered in each other kindred spirits, Clemenceau was pictured as having expected to find in Mr. Wilson a Moses with tablets of stone and as having "found instead a human being with a sense of humor like himself."

REPRESENTATIONS that the President had committed himself to the program of the League to Enforce Peace brought from Mr. Wilson, on December 18, a statement in which he said: "I am, as every one knows, not only in favor of a League of Nations, but believe the formation of such a league indispensable to the maintenance of peace. But the particular plan of the League to Enforce Peace I have never directly or indirectly endorsed."

The President was also reported to have conferred at some length with the Italian Ambassador to America, Count di Cellere, regarding the conflicting interests of Italy and the new state of Jugoslavia. Italy asks for the entire extension of her boundaries contemplated in the agreement with the Entente which marked her entry into the war. Some of this territory is not now peopled to any degree by Italians, but is occupied by Slavs who, if included under the Italian flag, would present to Italy the same degree of difficulty which accrued to Austria in governing the unredeemed Italian provinc The President was reported inclined to favor the wishes of t Slavs, and in this he was said be supported by the Italian Pr mier and a considerable body the Italian press. Preside Wilson and King Victor Emma uel were scheduled for a conf ence on Friday, when the Ki would act as host to the Preside

December 18 was a wet day a President Wilson kept most indoors, working on correspon ence and holding only one conf ence, with Gabriel Hanotaux, f mer French Foreign Minister, w came to make arrangements f the reception of Mr. Wilson by t French Institute.

It was announced on Decem 18 that the Chinese and Japane delegations to the Peace Congr would reach Paris about Jan ary 9.

PRESIDENT WILSON, December 19, received a c from King Victor Emanuel Italy and was in conference wi Premier Clemenceau of Fran and with Col. House. In t evening he was a guest of t Committee of France-Ameri at a reception.

President Wilson on the aft noon of December 19 attend the initiation of Marshal Jof as one of the 40 immortals co posing the French Academy.

Friday December 20 was Ital day with the President. In t morning he had a long conferen with Premier Orlando and Bar Sonnino, the Italian Foreign M ister; in the afternoon he s Ambassador Page and later turned the call of King Vic Emanuel, the call lasting thi quarters of an hour.

On December 21, Preside Wilson received the Degree Doctor, Honoris Causa, from t Sorbonne, the University of Pa this being the first honora degree ever conferred by University. The degree w granted as a testimonial to M Wilson's work as a historian a his writings on historical subje In accepting the degree t President said that he felt v keenly the distinguished ho which had been conferred up him. He declared that a refere to education in the address of Lucien Poincaré, Vi Rector of the University who had conferred the degr tempted him to venture upon a favorite theme, wh was that "the chief object of education was to awa the spirit." He said that the war had been p ceded by two systems of education, one wh "stripped learning of moral restraints, an aggress system" "using science without conscience," a another which sought above all things "to free."

Continuing he said, "The triumph of freedom this war means that that spirit shall now domin the world. There is a great wave of moral fo moving through the world and every man w opposes himself to that wave will go down in disgra . . . My conception of the League of Nations just this—that it shall operate as the organized mo force of men throughout the world, and that wh ever or wherever wrong and aggression are plan or contemplated, this searching light of conscie will be turned upon them and men everywhere ask, 'What are the purposes that you hold in y heart against the fortunes of the world?' Jus little exposure will settle most questions."

President Wilson will be entertained at Buckingh Palace while in England and will spend Sun December 29 at Carlisle, his mother's birthplace

Instead of going to church on December 22 Pr dent Wilson spent four hours at the American Cross Hospital at Neuilly where he shook ha and talked with each one of 1,200 badly woun American men, most of them survivors of the fight at Chateau Thierry. He remarked to one of soldiers that there were no men in the hosp wounded in the upper part of the body. soldier answered "The men who were woun above the waist are not here; they have gone o

Celebrating Jerusalem's Deliverance

AN EVENT which will live in the memory of the thousands present was the celebration of the liberation of Palestine in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York City, cember 17. Indeed, in some things it was unpre-ented as a demonstration of religious unity. vs and Oriental, Roman Catholic and Protestant ristians, took part in the proceedings and made up cosmopolitan audience.

Each feature of this great meeting might well have olumn of description, and if all could be staged in simple, sincere, natural manner of its first pro-ction, it would be a very attractive entertainment. t the purpose was a serious one. It was a thanks-ing to Almighty God for the deliverance of the red shrines of the Jewish and Christian peoples n the heavy, oppressive hand of the unteachable k. The thought of the celebration, which orig-ted in the Methodist Preachers' Meeting, was pted by the Federation of Churches of New York, ler whose auspices it was developed by an executive mittee of Protestant, Roman Catholic, Greek tholic and Jewish ministers and laymen, of which v. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, Congregationalist, of klyn, was chairman, and Rev. Dr. Laidlaw, byterian, New York, secretary.

le colors of the Allies, the folds of the British French flags in loving touch with the Stars and pes, hung over the stage. The national anthem, which the perils and sacrifices of war have given a per note of harmony, was sung, and Bishop Burch, ll, stately Episcopal prelate, offered the invoca-n. Then came the presentation, by Dr. Nehemiah nton, of the Hon. Henry Morgenthau, former ted States Ambassador to Turkey, a Jew, as the iding officer, and his vivid description of his official visit to Palestine, in the company of sionaries and others; of the frowns of the sullen slem keepers of the graves of the Hebrew fathers he cave of Machpelah—purchased by Abraham self—as they grudgingly recognized the rule princes and ambassadors only may see these ent sepulchers at Hebron. It was exceedingly forting, he said, to know that, thanks to the ish conquest and not by reluctant consent or by ained concession, Jew and Christian can now down in peace and security in the home of their ers and worship in their own way, without let indrance. It was of the greatest significance that eforth the people who love truth and justice, e and righteousness, will have the power to give liberty to all to live and worship according to their own conscience, while the race of murderers are relegated to the territory of the Turks, where they can practice their tyranny upon themselves.

The reading from the Jewish Scriptures by Rabbi H. Pereira Mendes, in his robes and hat, gave a new significance to selections from the Psalms, especially the 115th and 105th. Then came the Christian Scriptures, read by a priest of the Eastern Orthodox Communion, partly in the Greek and partly in the English, the passages in Revelation about the new heavens and the new earth and the New Jerusalem seeming very appropriate. Prayers by Rabbi Silverman, Reformed Jewish, who asked the Almighty that one law for all races might henceforth prevail in Palestine; by Dr. F. M. North, president of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and Monsignor Sweeney, Roman Catholic, were in the spirit of reverent adoration.

The singing was furnished by two great Jewish choirs, the Cantors' Association, all men, in their ecclesiastical hats, who sang exquisitely the "Hallelujah," Psalm 150, and the mixed (men and women, Jewish and Christian) choir of Temple Emanu-El; and by the Apollo Club, of Brooklyn, 100 men highly trained. It is not given to many to hear such a wide range of sacred soul-stirring music.

The speeches were in keeping with the occasion. In simplicity, grace of expression and attractiveness of description nothing could exceed Dr. John H. Finley's account of his experiences in the Holy Land as head of the American Red Cross Commission. With humorous reference to the roughness of the country for the foot traveler, he said if he could attain to the honor of sepulture in Westminster Abbey, he felt that it would be easy and natural for those officiating to lay him away in the style of a crusader with his legs crossed, for his 500 miles of rough walking in Palestine had made them crooked. He walked because that was the way to see and enjoy its sacred scenes, and because the little country was so narrow that it could be crossed in a day from border to border.

Referring to the entrance into Jerusalem, he showed how careful and thoughtful General Allenby was that none of the traditions should be violated. The entry was to have been made December 8, but was postponed a day to avoid the possibility of conflict. When it was made it was made by Allenby and his staff on foot and unarmed, not a stone was disturbed, not a drop of blood was shed. Dr. Finley offered a suggestion for an interpretation of the name of Allenby, who broke the long rule of oppression of this ancient land of promise: Alle-Allah; neby, prophet—God's prophet. He took the journey Abraham took when he went to Moriah with Isaac, and traversed it in a few hours. Abraham required three days for the same distance. But Dr. Finley felt that if he were going on a like errand—to sacrifice his son—he too would have taken a long time.

Speaking of the cosmopolitan character of Allenby's forces, he said there was appropriately a Jewish regiment, and there were Irish, Scotch, English, Algerians, Armenians and other nationalities represented—all nations fighting to liberate the land for all nations. He proposed that Palestine should be an international reservation, with the British Government as a trustee for civilization.

THE Hon. P. Whitwell Wilson, a London newspaper man and former member of Parliament, gave America honorable part in the liberation of the Holy Land. It was because the boys of the Mississippi shed their blood on the battlefields of France, he said, that Allenby was able to liberate Jerusalem. He gave this counsel: "Jews of every country and every land, whether prosperous or persecuted, there is your land; make it your own again. Follow the footsteps of David and David's majestic Son."

Abram Ribhany, who said he was born in Syria and born again in America, wanted America to be the guardian of the liberty of Palestine; if not America, England; not a cooperative control. He said if anybody desired to know where to put the Turk, he would suggest that Billy Sunday answer the question.

The resolutions, carefully framed by a committee of which Hon. Charles E. Hughes was chairman and H. K. Carroll secretary, were unanimously and enthusiastically adopted. The four preambles eloquently recite the great things in the history of three thousand years which have made Palestine forever sacred to the Jew and the Christian, the home of the prophets, the land of the life and death and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth, and the country where the Christian Church was brought into being; and the resolutions join Jews, Catholics and Protestants "in fervent thanksgiving to Almighty God for the liberation of the land so dear to us all, and pray for his guidance in the establishment therein of a just and stable government, which shall preserve order, maintain the rights of each element of the diverse population, and assure to all, without distinction of race or creed, full civil and religious liberty."

A Week in the World's News

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS. President Wilson's presence in Paris has given renewed vitality to the proposal for a League of Nations, and on December 19, the correspondents, although lacking definite confirmation, were certain that France and America were practically agreed upon the main principles involved. Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, the French member of the Permanent Peace Conference at The Hague gave to the press, on December 19, a plan for the bringing about of the Society of Nations which had been presented to Premier Clemenceau and had been approved by him in principle. This plan contemplated agreement by all the nations upon compulsory arbitration without elimination or exception, including even questions of national honor and dignity. The limitation of armaments would be included in the agreement for arbitration and the establishment of a Council of Administration, following as a natural sequence, would provide for the formulating of international law. The decision of the Council is to be made effective by the application of four "sanctions." First is the diplomatic "sanction," the breaking of diplomatic relations with any recalcitrant nation. Second, Juridical "sanction," the closing of the courts of all nations to the recalcitrants. The third, economic "sanction," closing of the markets of all nations, cutting off foodstuffs and raw materials. The fourth, military "sanction," in which the united nations would enforce the decision of the Society of Nations by the use of international force. This involves the creation of a small international military force and provides a safe use for the German vessels which some have proposed to sink, in preference to facing the involved question of division of this fleet.

TO REPEAL ZONE POSTAGE RATES. The Senate, on December 19, by a vote of 34 to 22 approved the Finance Committee Amendment proposing the repeal on July 1st next of the present zone system on second-class postage, substituting for it a rate of one cent per pound within 150 miles and one and one-half cents beyond. On the preceding day the Senate adopted the Amendment levying a tax of ten per cent. on profits from products of Child Labor entering Interstate Commerce.

BY AIRPLANE TO THE POLE. Captain Robert A. Bartlett, the commander of the ship Roosevelt, in the expéditions to the North Pole directed by Rear Admiral Peary, is to make an attempt this coming summer to fly from some point north of Etah across the Pole to Cape Chelyuskin, Siberia. There are six weeks of good flying weather in the Polar summer, and many unknown regions about the Pole will be scouted over, in addition to the flight across the axis of the earth.

MORE LOSSES. An unofficial estimate places the French loss in killed during the war at 1,400,000, while 800,000 recovered from wounds. The German losses will approach 2,000,000 in killed. Italy's losses in lives are placed at 500,000. Russia's casualties in the war are estimated at 9,150,000 men, of whom 1,700,000 were killed and 1,450,000 disabled. As for America, the last restriction on the use of foodstuffs was removed December 22, but each patriot is still expected to avoid waste.

ENEMY SHIPS FOR FOOD. Herbert Hoover will soon have 1,000,000 tons of former German merchant ships turned over to him as provided by the armistice. The ships will be used first to carry food to Belgium, France, Serbia and Rumania. The new flag of the Allied Maritime Council, which is two horizontal white stripes with a blue stripe between them, will be raised over 500,000 tons of Austrian shipping which will be put into the service of relief under Italian crews.

RED CROSS ROLL CALL. Scattering reports from only forty per cent. of the chapters of the Red Cross on December 22 showed an enrollment of 13,000,000 persons in the Christmas Roll Call. It was expected that complete returns would show that last year's record of 22,000,000 had been somewhat exceeded.

A NEW HINDENBURG LINE. Dispatches of December 20 reported General von Hindenburg as planning a new front line six miles east of the neutral zone fixed by the armistice terms. It was suggested that this line might face both east and west, Hindenburg being credited in some quarters with counter-revolutionary designs. The German army is being demobilized, only the soldiers from nineteen to twenty-two, inclusive, being held in service.

POLAND MAKES CERTAIN OF PORT. A Warsaw dispatch of December 19 reported the landing of Polish troops numbering 50,000 at Danzig, a Baltic port in West Prussia, formerly a part of the Kingdom of Poland, which it has been reported to be the plan of the Allies to return to reunited Poland.

KAISER WON'T LEAVE HOLLAND. The Amsterdam Telegraph, on December 16, printed a statement to the effect that the former Kaiser had been requested to leave Holland voluntarily owing to the embarrassing position in which her hospitality to him placed her. He was reported to have refused to leave. Berlin dispatches of December 18 place the ex-Kaiser's private cash fortune at 20,000,000 marks or about $4,760,000, which was deposited in banks at four and one-half per cent. interest. In addition to the cash, the Hohenzollerns were also reported to claim title to ninety estates. The Socialist Government was reported to be confiscating as much as could be shown to be crown property.

THE RUSSIAN PROBLEMS. Washington and London dispatches of December 17 agreed in stating that the problem of Russia was one of the most serious to come before the Peace Conference, it becoming a two-sided one; first, becau of the uncertainty as to what group men would authoritatively represent t nation; second, because of the appare necessity of doing something to sa Russia and the world from Bolshevis without any clear perception as to wh that something might be. The creati of a dictatorship by Admiral Kolchak the government at Omsk, and the di sion of what had appeared to be uni into a number of factions, have balk recognition of that régime as a go ern ment. Bolshevik troops were r ported as following up the withdraw of the German a mies into Esthon and the territo of the Lettish repu lic, and as havi reached a poi within 100 miles Riga. The Letti Republic and go ernment and t Esthonian Prov sional Governme had both appeal to Sweden and the Allies for mi tary support. Ca W. THE GERMAN REVOLUTION

The First Photographs Received in America

ON November 8 Germany was an Imperial Federation; on November 9 it was a Socialistic Republic. Overnight the militarists and Junkers and Pan-Germans were shaken from the seat of power and the people took the tribune. It was an almost bloodless and mobless revolution, so much so that the Allied world at first suspected it to be a ruse of discredited Junkerism to gain a soft peace. But it has proved a real revolution; it has survived both the assaults of red terrorism and the attempts of reactionaries at counter-revolution, and on December 19 an assembly of delegates, after some preliminary interruptions, was meeting quietly in Berlin planning for the constituent convention which should create the constitution of the New Germany. The Kaiser, it develops, signed his abdication, under pressure of the Foreign Office and his military advisers, after it had been formally announced by the Socialists in Berlin

*A NEW YEAR'S SERMON BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

TEXT—Gen. 13 : 7–11. "There was a strife between the herdmen of Abram's cattle and the herdmen of Lot's cattle. . . . And Abram and Lot separated."

HOW did the strife begin? "And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their substance was great, so that they could not dwell together." And so the strife was born of prosperity! "It is the bright day that bringeth forth the adder." We commonly emphasize the perils that hide in the night, "the pestilence that walketh in darkness." But there are some dangers from which the night-time is exempt. There are snares that belong only to the day, "a destruction that wasteth at noontide."

Success often severs where poverty unites. This is true in family life; brothers are often sundered by success who in the days of incompetency were firmly and intimately one. Success is frequently the mother of pride, and a proud spirit is always the minister of alienation. Our abundance becomes the hotbed of quarrelsomeness, and humility moves afar off. "How hard it is for them that have riches to enter the Kingdom of Heaven!"

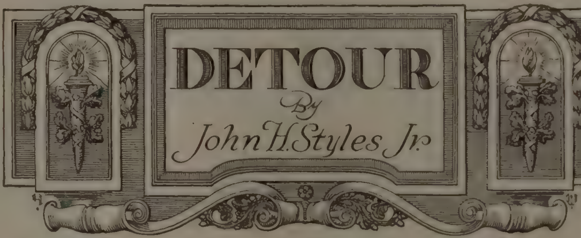
And it is equally true in the life of nations. As nations become big and prosperous, they become the breeding-grounds of pride and fatal vauntings. Switzerland does not give much trouble to the peace of the world. It is the vast, expanding empires that are productive of strife. It is when the national substance becomes great, and other nations are adding to their territorial wealth, so that we cannot dwell together, that quarrelsomeness is begotten and strife ensues. Expansion is always attended by moral peril. And the principle has larger applications still; it applies to the life of churches and democracies; wealth and power engender pride, and pride is overbearing and insensitive, and there is trouble and irritableness where there should be self-control and peace. There is strife among the brethren, a strife which is the product of the noontide.

NOW, let us note one of the issues of this strife. Civil strife saps the strength which is requisite for warfare against the common foe. "And the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelt then in the land." When the brothers were united, and the herdmen were one, they could meet the foe with a common front; but when they were divided the Canaanite and the Perizzite became obtrusive, and the brothers were despoiled.

And surely the old-world incident has a significance for our own day! Is not the brotherhood of the churches drained of its strength by its divisions? There are gigantic enemies stalking fearlessly through the land, able to vaunt their evil prowess because of the impotence of the divided Church. These enemies would go under and be crushed, if the hosts of the Lord moved with common step. We sometimes sing a hymn in which we boast our unity: "Like a mighty army moves the Church of God." "All one body we!" This is the coveted ideal, but it is not descriptive of our actual state. Reality is proclaimed in another line, "By schism rent asunder!" And many of these schisms are born of worldly dignities and pride, and by one and all the Church is paralyzed. The Canaanite and the Perizzite laugh at our feebleness, and pass through the land unresisted. A divided Church can never oust the devil!

BUT now the narrative gains a brighter color, for we pass into the warm shining of the Sun of Righteousness. In the very midst of the strife there appears the radiant grace of magnanimity. "And Abram said unto Lot, Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen; for we be brethren. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me: if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left."

Is that the speech of the man who so recently resorted to falsehood in the land of Egypt? Is that the man who turned his eyes from the refuge of the Almighty and sought subterfuge in a lie? The patriarch had discovered that the ordinances of God's world offer no security to the liar. He had been pricked by the goads of the Eternal, and he had found that his own petty devices had been blown to fragments before the tempest of God's resistance. He had learned that immorality is never required to further the divine purpose, and that a lie will never provide a covert from the storm. And so, at the old altar, he had reconsecrated his spirit and recovered his moral tone.



DETOUR

By John H. Styles Jr.

I LAID the course my life should take:
  'Twas straight and smooth and fine.
I vowed to hold it faithfully
  Until success was mine.
And oh, the world was fair—so fair!
  And oh, my heart beat high!
My days were scintillant with hope—
  They never knew a sigh.

Then came Adversity. She barred
  The road ahead of me
And pointed to an unknown lane.
  I turned reluctantly—
And oh, my hopes went glimmering!
  And oh, my heart was dead!
I tried to sing the blues away
  But only sighed, instead.

I've journeyed now for many months
  And still have far to go;
But I have learned 'tis sweet to tread
  The lane I did not know.
And oh, the world is fair again!
  And oh, but God is good!
I'm learning, as I go, the joy
  Of human brotherhood.

I know not when or where the lane
  I'm traveling today
Will join the road to my success,
  But I'll hold on my way!
And oh, my heart is eager now!
  And oh, my feet run free!
God knows the course my life should take—
  His way is best for me!

And what an air of quiet trust now pervades his speech! Because he is trustful he is gracious, and because he is gracious he is generous; he reflects the very "mind of Christ." I do not wonder when I read the narrative that Jehovah himself should speak of this magnanimous patriarch as "Abraham my friend." How gracious it would be if the now divided churches spake to one another in words such as these: Is there not room for all of us in the city? "Is not the whole land before thee? Cannot we wisely distribute our forces?" At any rate, this is the speech of the saints.

IN CONTRAST with Abram's magnanimous conduct let us turn to the life of Lot. "And Lot lifted up his eyes and beheld . . . !" And what did he see? What is the range and quality of his outlook? That is always an interesting question when applied to anybody's life. There can be nothing more determinative of the value of a man's life than just the scope and character of his vision. Whe opens his eyes, and looks out upon the world, does he see? What was the nature of Lot's prehension?

He saw "the plain of Jordan that it was watered." He saw that it was an ideal pas land, "even as the garden of the Lord." He sa was equal to the best he had ever seen, "like the of Egypt." He saw the vast extent of it, reac even unto Zoar. This is what Lot saw, and was all that he saw! His outlook was purely mat istic. He had "got an eye" for fat pastures. friends often said of him, "Lot's got an eye fo main chance!" "He knows a good thing whe sees it!" "You trust Lot, he wi be far off at the feast!" An friends were right. "Then Lot him all the plain of Jordan, and journeyed east." And I wa there ,were fine revelries in tent that night! I think I can the laughter, as men sat at the of their tents, and looked at flocks standing knee-deep in luscious pasturage! I have doubt that more than one man to his neighbor, "Lot has finely the old man!" And the quiet looked down.

BUT the materialistic vision had not co hended the entire outlook. We shou nearer the mark if we said that Lot is afflicted materialistic blindness. "But the men of were wicked and sinners before the Lord e ingly." Lot's eyes had not beheld this; they scaled and quite undiscerning of presences kind. Lot saw the rich pastures, but had n for the vicious companionships. His debit credit accounts were not sufficiently comprehe He thought it was all gain, and there was no and amazing loss! He had gained material and lost an uplifting fellowship. How unlik other man in a far-off later day, who had a cha fat pasturages and prosperous conditions, but eyes were ever inquiring for the excellent: "I all things but loss that I may know Him!"

Now, Lot's form of materialism is still ra in our own day. I think one might almost sa the majority of people are altogether concerne the quality of pastures and not with the mora spiritual conditions of the estate. How people, when they are in search of a home any regard to its moral environment? They of the size of the garden, of its distance fro town, its easy access into the riches of the co side. They make little or no inquiry abou church, and the nature of the social fellow And the same oversight often characterize arrangements for a holiday. And it is ev in the choice of a trade; the predominant is just this; is there money in it? And if it o prospect of fat and fattening pastures every consideration is ignored. It is Lot all over!

AND so Abram and Lot separated, and each his own way. What the issue will be time can tell. But let us take the narrativ stage further. "And the Lord said unto Abram Abram was passing into less fertile meadows, was enjoying the companionship of God! garden is not so rich, but the voice of the L breathing through it! There is many a man material estate is very impoverished, but he sounds make music in it. "Far, far away, lik at evening pealing, the voice of Jesus sound land and sea." "The Lord said unto Ab What matters it that the road be commonp we have the companionship of the King? T no record of any such speech with Lot. H filled his tent; there was heavenly music in th of Abram. That is the true wealth, the wealt will remain when everything else fails.

> "Peace, perfect peace, our future all unkn > Jesus we know, and He is on the throne."

The Defiance of a Dreadful Joy

SUNDAY, January 5. · Acts 5 : 41. "They departed from the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name." What can the enemy do with men of that kind? ogging only rouses a certain kind of joy. Reproach worn as a garland. Menace seems only to act like exhilarating atmosphere. When these disciples t the council chamber, their judges must have felt terly impotent before a joy which sang its triumph- t songs in the night. There was a quiet defiance their joy which was more telling than the witness the boldest speech. It may indeed be called a readful joy," for its strange light was the indwell- glory of the Lord. It was a joy to be dreaded, it carried the quenchless flame of the fires of God. e joy of the Lord was their strength.

f we think about it we shall find that holy joy is finest weapon in the fight with sin. There is hing which is so arresting and so disturbing to our . Our enemy can meet every other sort of approach h rude bravado, but he shrinks before the terrible tainty of holy joy. This holy joy is not only a t of the Spirit, it is our finest piece of armor. We fighting with the rarest weapon when we fight h holy joy.

his "dreadful joy," which defies the menace of omy antagonisms, is marvelous witness to the grace Christ. Nothing is doing more for the Kingdom now than sorrow which reveals itself in quiet, holy ne. When that strange fire burns in the bush, and ns there through the night, men will surely say to another, "Let us turn aside and see this great t," and they will begin to realize that the place ereon they stand is holy ground. A New Name

ONDAY, January 6. Rev. 2 : 17. "To him that overcometh will I give . . . a white stone and the stone a new name written." The Scriptures ish us the record of many lives which were so red by the entrance into them of the power of that even their names were changed. So Abram ame Abraham; Jacob became Israel; Levi be- e Matthew; Simon became Peter, and Saul be- e Paul. The closing of the canon of the Holy ptures did not close the record of changed lives and names. Augustine the libertine became Augus- the devout. John Bunyan the ignorant black- rd becomes John Bunyan the preacher, the im- tal dreamer, the prisoner of the Lord, and Bed- Jail becomes another Patmos. What a change n John B. Gough, drunken, helpless, hopeless, John B. Gough, the trumpet-tongued apostle of tinence! What a transformation was that which hed Jerry McAuley, outcast and jail-bird, into y McAuley, the shepherd of lost sheep! What a creation was that which accounted for the mak- over of that Minneapolis lawyer, inebriate, for- en by his family, raving in delirium, into a sober and an evangelist of temperance, his tongue ped with the honey of poetic speech! Some fifty rs ago a young man sat in an Indianapolis saloon Sunday morning with several of his companions, king and playing cards. Suddenly something ched a secret spring of motive. Something struck ystic chord of memory. Something gave him un- ted vigor of resolution. He left his friends, since y would not follow him. He went to his room, nd a long-neglected Bible, read it until the way salvation shone before him, and there began a eer of Christian experience and testimony which not yet ended. That man, a lay preacher, has claimed the Gospel in his generation to more than e millions of people and has helped hundreds of usands into the light of the new life. What facts d be more wonderful than these? What power o nearly immeasurable as that which enables us reak with our past, to abandon old idols, and not to bear the new name but to deserve it? We not know what new name is reserved for us n we enter in through the gates into the City, each of us may bear the new and holy name of ist. C. C. A.

Power from the Lord

UESDAY, January 7. Luke 10 : 19. "Behold, I have given you power to tread on serpents and pions, and over all the power of the enemy; and ing shall by any means hurt you." The joy of iples over the triumphs which they gain in their stling with sin must ever be tempered with a n reflection on the dangers which constantly surround them. Sin is a wily and venomous reptile: its devotees, even when they must yield to the champions of righteousness, withdraw sullenly, their hearts filled with hatred and plotting revenge. They will enlist the powers of ungodliness to recapture lost territory, and they will spread cunning lies that look almost as truths, to perplex the disciples in their work or ensnare them. The Lord sees all this in advance of its happening; he beholds the net of temptation spread against his loved ones, and the armies of wickedness getting ready for their attack on his believers. Accordingly, he addresses a word of warning to them, but this word is still wrapped in cheer; it is uttered with the strongest assurance of his unconquerable support.

The promise is still in force to all His believers; when he wills, nothing can hurt those who have put their trust in him. They still move among serpents and scorpions; they perceive it in the hiss and snap of many an angry word that is hurled at them. They feel oftentimes that they are battling against great odds. But they are also made aware in their moments of peril of the mighty power that is thrown around them for their protection, and marvel at the strength which they themselves have been able to display.

The Promise to Joshua

WEDNESDAY, January 8. Deut. 31 : 8. "He it is that goeth before thee; he will be with thee; he will not fail thee, neither forsake thee." Moses thus communicates God's words to Joshua, his successor, as he is about to ascend to heaven from Mount Nebo. Joshua might well tremble in view of his youth and the great achievements which he was expected to accomplish. He felt strong in the strength of Almighty God, as he went forth under the encouragement of the wonderful promises Moses had announced from the divine Ruler of mankind. He believed victory would crown his leadership, that God would go before him and be his rearward. He judged the future by the past. He believed that the God who had led Moses for forty years would not desert him. He believed the Jerichos would fall and that Israel would become the great nation divinely promised.

Does not divine providence go before each individual, preparing the way for every tomorrow? The earth, God's storehouse, has been filled with supplies for the needs of his peoples. Here are hidden rivers of oil, beds of coal, a multitude of minerals; here are fields and forests and streams and sunshine. He has gone before us all, leading us in the way of light and happiness. His Almighty power will not fail thee. His resources are inexhaustible. All we need to do is to consecrate all our powers to the service of his kingdom, believing what he says, "I will never fail thee nor forsake thee; fear not, be not dismayed." Joshua could not see the future except in these blessed words of Omnipotence. He was willing to battle for the right, never doubting that the words of his commission were from the divine Father, the ruling Power of the universe. Joshua triumphed gloriously; every one may do the same who toils and fights and trusts. E. W. C.

Jesus' Relatives

THURSDAY, January 9. Matt. 12 : 49. "And he stretched forth his hand toward his disciples, and said, Behold my mother my brethren." Love for our kindred is a very natural affection. He is unhuman who will not do his utmost for his own. We have no name ugly enough to apply to one who does not protect and defend his own sister or his own daughter. Now if we look into the lives of those who devote themselves to the cure of social ills; if we look into the hearts of those who, though they may not be active reformers, still strive to wear upon their breasts "the white flower of blameless living," we shall find that such persons have simply enlarged their conceptions of duty in relation to members of their own families to the extent to which they have come to see the whole human family as one. Such a man would say, "I love my own, but who are my own? I am brother to all who need." Is not this the lesson of the parable of the Good Samaritan?

A very remarkable story appeared in one of the magazines a few years ago. It was the story of the child of well-to-do parents, who had been kidnapped, and brought up among the very poor. At a tender age he was put into a factory where one day he met with an accident which maimed him for life. It so happened that the largest owner of the factory was that child's own father. When it was brought home to him that in tolerating the economic evil of child-labor in his mill, he was condemning his own child to virtual slavery and to death, he saw more force in the appeal for the abolition of child-labor than he had ever seen before. Ah, yes, how we cherish our own! Well, the love of Christ is a power at once so extensive, so expansive, and so intensive that it leads those upon whom it rests to adopt humanity as its own. The closing chapter of a popular story gives us a glimpse of the outpouring of the poor, the lame and halt and blind, at the funeral of a physician in a very needy section of a great city. A man of the world who attended the funeral was much surprised at the throngs, and said to somebody, "Who are these people? They act as though they were his father and mother and brothers and sisters." And some one answered, "They are." C. C. A.

Divine Omniscience

FRIDAY, January 10. Luke 10 : 18. "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven." In this remarkable intuition of the Saviour we have a glimpse of his deity. The seventy had just returned from their first preaching expedition with enthusiastic reports of their success: "Even the devils," they had cried, "are subject unto us through thy name." They considered this the most astonishing proof of the power of that evangelical word which they had been commissioned to proclaim. By the simple preaching of the mercy of God to sinners they had made the devils flee apace. Jesus sanctions their joy and shares it. Yea, he increases it by telling them things which only his divine omniscience could know. Before his all-seeing eye even the secrets of the world of spirits lie open.

The power of the prince of darkness is very great in this world. Satan himself had boasted of this to Jesus at the temptation in the desert. His spiritual wickedness has become entrenched in high places. He has made all authority, learning, art, wealth of men tributary to him. He is, as Paul has called him in the original Greek of Eph. 6 : 12, "the world-lord of this present darkness." When he must yield to the greater power of truth, righteousness, and love which the messengers of Jesus wield over men's hearts by the simple instrumentality of teaching and preaching, it is as when a dazzling shaft of lightning is hurled from a great height, strikes the ground and disappears. But when he tells us of these successes which we perceive but imperfectly, he not only confirms our joys over our victories as righteous and true joys, but he cheers us to new and greater endeavors. Our labor in the Lord is never in vain; his word never returns void. With implicit faith in the matchless virtue of the old Gospel of the Crucified we go forth to the tasks of a new year. In him who is the Prince of life, the only true Potentate, the Sage of all the ages, and last, not least, the incomparable Friend of the poor and the Succorer of the needy, we shall go on from strength to strength, and he will witness with his might unto our humble endeavors. W. H. T. D.

Vine and Branches

SATURDAY, January 11. John 15 : 1. "I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman." Jesus had just partaken of the Last Supper with his disciples. They drank of the fruit of the vine together. In this way they were in the future to show forth the Lord's death till his second coming. They were to drink in remembrance of him. The bread represented his broken body, the wine his shed blood. This Supper commemorates the victories on Calvary. It is the flag of the Cross.

How natural it was for the Christ, while pouring out the juice of the grape, to say, "I am the vine; ye are the branches." Our abiding in the Vine is absolutely essential to fruit-bearing. The branch has no power separated from the vine, for "without me ye can do nothing." When severed by sin, we must be reunited by a process similar to grafting. Then the branch is again one with the vine. The union is intimate and complete. If the branch is injured, the Vine feels compassion and sympathy, and rooted in the infinite heart of the Father, perfect union is enjoyed and communion. The Vine is glorified by the fruitage; one is essential to the other. The Vine says to the branches, "I am your life and power; I am with you always. I am Christ in you, the hope of glory, the power of the Cross, the life of the soul. Ye are witnesses of me when ye bear much fruit."

The branch is like a wire to communicate the life the vine imparts to the growing fruit. The figure, however, fails when we know that we are living beings, like Christ, and that he is more than a wooden vine, the holy One of God, the Creator of the universe, the Lover of the human soul. E. W. C.

The "Hope Eternal"

IN CONSIDERING the great religious issues that have grown out of the war, and while recognizing the immeasurable increase of faith in God which it has produced, there is one view of the situation that should not be overlooked. This is very clearly stated by Arthur Mee in a recent article in the London Chronicle, from which we quote this significant passage:

> "The victorious Allies have saved the world from something more than death. They have saved mankind from the loss of its faith in God. The faith in the Creator and Sustainer of the world could hardly survive the victory of the forces of deviltry in Europe. Let it be never forgotten that the mastery of the German was to be not over empire only, but over the mind of the world. Deeper than we knew was the depth of the bottomless pit, for the mind of the conquered world was to be emptied not only of its faith in liberty, in justice, in fraternity, but of its faith in God."

The writer reminds us that for twenty years Germany has been letting loose its flood of materialism on Europe and America. It was sowing the seed of doubt and disbelief. The real barrier in the German path was man's faith in God, in his justice, and in his promise, which kept aglow men's hearts with the "hope eternal." If might had triumphed over right, German infidelity would have had its way. Her unspeakable crimes against humanity would have been condoned and unpunished. In this most vital sense, her triumph would have set back the whole world, morally, spiritually, physically and economically, to the conditions of a semi-barbaric age. It is a gloomy picture, yet one that should be taken into the reckoning, for it shows, at a new and startling angle, some of the dangers we have escaped. Happily for all, in the struggle between Faith and Unfaith, Faith has gloriously won.

The Boston Evening Transcript has called attention to another aspect of the new religious attitude which is now being emphasized, namely, that God is a God of justice as well as of love and mercy, and that in the desire to draw men, the love of God has been dwelt upon while his justice has been well-nigh forgotten. This has been wisely stated by many leading ministers of late. Pre-war popular theology assured the sinner that he need not worry about his sins—that they were to be accepted as in the very nature of things, and that all that mattered was to realize "the need of love, humanity, and brotherhood." Such preaching gave a wrong conception of true religion, and an altogether wrong estimate of the character and mission of Jesus Christ. The whole war may be interpreted as showing the error of such teaching, and the need of repentance, and of the works meet for repentance. In a large sense, therefore, the reconstructive process which is now taking place in the Christian Church in America must be a spiritual one on Gospel lines. Our men are coming home from the war by tens of thousands every week. They have been face to face with death in many forms. They have felt deeply the need of a living Saviour and of spiritual cleansing. They have realized that God means that those who would obey him should follow the light he has given them through the revelation of his Son. Those men will never again be satisfied with any preaching that holds sin lightly. They will have a living, vital, transforming Gospel, and no other.

The call of the Church must be to save the millions of men and women who have been engaged not only at the front but in every kind of war service. "The Church," says an earnest writer, "must hold out a thousand welcoming hands to them, and give them not only material aid, but the renewing life of the Gospel. The Church alone can reach their souls." What are our American churches doing toward such a work among those now returning to us? Will they be satisfied with the formal ministry of other days? We are glad to notice that there is a growing spirit of preparation among the churches. Haste is necessary, lest we be found unprepared. Rev. Paul Moody, son of the great evangelist, who had been in spiritual service in France, recently declared in the pulpit: "We never faced a bigger national problem than now. The spirit of Jesus must be applied to national and international relationships. Many persons are contented with the simplicity of the Gospel, but Jesus answers our longings only as we stand in fellowship with him."

In his noble address in response to the speech of welcome of President Poincaré in Paris, President Wilson stated that he came as the ambassador of this nation to present its ultimate thought and high ideal to the Allied members in the Conference. That ideal is one of world-service. It involves changes which will benefit all the peoples and will lead them to a new international righteousness. Similarly, the Church must be prepared now to apply the compelling power of the whole Gospel to the returning millions, and also to those who have waited for them at home. She must speak through all her servants with one voice and in perfect accord. With unity at the Peace table, and unity in the Church wherever Christ and his cross are held up to men, we can look forward to the tasks of the New Year with perfect confidence.

Help the Bowery Mission

IN THE multitude of appeals that are made to the generosity of good people in these eventful days, we would specially urge that the Bowery Mission should not be forgotten. It is now in its season of highest activity. Men who have been in the war and whose need of Christ in their lives has been awakened, are present at the mission meetings. There they find the old Gospel, mighty in its power to save both soul and body, and to recreate the lives of men and annuate them with a new purpose and a nobler aim. It is important that the work of the Mission at this particular time should be maintained at the highest point of efficiency. Its influence is not confined to the immediate neighborhood of the Mission building, but radiates far and wide. Its most capable workers are giving the Gospel message to good audiences in different churches, some in the city, others in the suburbs, and not a few in distant towns in other states.

We trust that our readers who have been giving so freely to many good causes will remember to send an offering to help the Bowery Mission to keep up its good work of soul-winning. It should not be hampered by lack of means to carry it on with undiminished energy. Send your gift today to the Bowery Mission, to the care of the Christian Herald. Every gift will be duly acknowledged in these pages.

The Zone Postal Rates Doomed

THE iniquitous "Zone" postage law for periodicals, put into effect July 1 last, is doomed to the early death it deserves.

It has involved increases of 50 to 900 per cent in the postage upon periodicals and papers of national circulation. This law was slipped through Congress as a war emergency measure, without adequate hearings or consideration, though it was designed and worded to be permanent. The total effects in six months' operation are unsatisfactory even on the revenue side, and outrageously unjust to publishers and reading public.

The Senate Finance Committee has reported an amendment so broad as to amount almost to a repeal. The amended measure becomes a part of the Revenue bill and will undoubtedly pass both Houses without serious challenge. It provides, instead of the eight postal zones with their increasingly burdensome rates, only two zones with rates of 1 cent and 1½ cents a pound. The Senate accepted the amendment December 19.

So enormously do the periodicals of national circulation contribute to business-building that it is contended by many a leading economist that they might even be carried free in the mails to the profit of the nation. The advertising they carry, which it was the design of the zone system to burdensomely tax, is really the life blood of the country's business.

As a vehicle for disseminating public information, verified and digested, the national periodical is without a rival. Reaching all sections and all classes and alive to the interests of all, it serves to solidify the thought and feeling of the nation as no other instrumentality does or can.

Congress will be giving good service to the country in amending the postage rates on a rational and just basis. The members who are working for this act of justice are to be warmly commended.

Clothes and Character

"ALL the world's a stage," wrote Shakespeare. Human nature has changed but little since the bard of Avon gave the world the benefit of his philosophic observations.

Richard Mansfield was one of the most versatile actors of his day. We are reminded of this by the announcement that his collection of stage costumes, in which he "in his life played many parts," has been given by his widow to the National Museum in Washington. During his long mimic career he was by turn soldier of fortune, adventurer, recluse, tyrant, spendthrift, courtier, regicide, king, czar, and a long line of other characters, some historic and others imaginary; and now, as the sole visible remembrance of his histrionic greatness—we have his clothes. Well, clothes, too, have character.

And this reminds us of the fact that another actor lately retired, is possessed of a bigger wardrobe than Mansfield could ever have dreamed of. The Berlin Börsen Zeitung announces that an inventory of the ex-Kaiser's personal possessions, just taken at the Berlin and Potsdam palaces, revealed him as the possessor of not less than 596 military and naval uniforms, German and foreign. These all belong to Wilhelm and were in actual commission for the various parts he had to play in his meteoric career up to the time of his inglorious flight. Here are possibilities which would make a quick-change actor turn green with envy. Berry Wall, who was noted in his day as the most magnificently dressed man in New York, could not hold a candle to the Hohenzollern. Wall had only a few score suits for all occasions, while Wilhelm had them by hundreds, and was equipped for taking his place in the sun—rather let us say in the limelight—on short notice at every opportunity. How the cynical old author of "Sartor Resartus" would have gloated over this new verification of his theory that the world is too apt to bow down to mere clothes, regardless of the worth or worthlessness of their wearer.

Which leads us to remark that very likely there isn't a suit in the whole of the ex-Kaiser's collection which he would deliberately pick with a view to impressing a jury when he appears for the great trial.

The Soldier Who Had Faith in Prayer

A CALIFORNIAN soldier of the American Forces in France, in a letter to relatives in San Bernardino, relates an incident which throws light on the spiritual character of the generalissimo of the Allied armies. Entering an old church in the fighting zone, the Californian, while standing bareheaded and looking about him, saw a gray man, with the eagles of a general upon the collar of his shabby uniform. He had just come in, and an orderly was his sole companion. The gray man fell upon his knees and remained in silence, praying for fully three-quarters of an hour. When he rose and left the edifice with his aide, the American soldier followed, curious to know more about this strange, earnest, silent visitor. Soon he saw soldiers saluting him, and women and children stopped to look at him as he passed. Then he learned from one of the French soldiers that the silent gray man was General Foch, commander of the armies who were fighting at that moment for freedom and justice. Even while he had been kneeling, the noise of the guns was reverberating through the little town and across the hills and valleys, along a battle line nearly one hundred miles in length. Yet he could find time to step aside from it all, and, in the heat of the conflict, pray to the God of battles for victory. This, the soldier learned, was an almost everyday occurrence with the man in gray.

Throughout the French armies, Foch is known as a deeply religious man, who goes to God upon his knees every day of his life. He has always been a praying man. He has learned to value the summoning of the heavenly forces as a reinforcement to the armaments of man, and he has learned also that they are not only the mightier of the two, but are invincible. There must have been many hours when the fortunes of war seemed almost hopeless; yet Foch prayed on. He prayed incessantly. He brought faith to his prayers, and his faith in God won, when nothing else could have helped. That faith was the assurance of victory.

An Unsolicited Tribute

NOT what is gathered into barns and into banks, but what is distributed to meet human needs, is true wealth. Not what a man gets out of life for himself, but what he puts into it for others, makes him rich. Time, talents, opportunity, health, all these are priceless riches, and these make the Christian Herald the neatest, most useful, Christian Magazine in the world.

It is clean.
It is wholesome.
It is entertaining.
It is carefully edited.
It is beautifully illustrated.
It is the most instructive.
It is the most comprehensive.
It is the most readable.
It has the confidence and loyalty of its subscribers.
It reaches thrifty, prosperous and enterprising people.
It brings results that prove it invaluable to the advertiser.

Advertising is the Big Gun of Business. The attractive advertisements in the Christian Herald are good ammunition. Some magazines are good some of the time; the Christian Herald is good all the time.

Florida Ratifies Prohibition

ON NOVEMBER 27 the Florida Legislature ratified the National Prohibition Amendment by a vote of 25 to 2 in the Senate and of 61 to 3 in the House, thus becoming the fifteenth of the thirty-six states necessary to secure national prohibition forever. The legislature of Florida does not meet till April 3, but Governor Catts called a special session of the legislature for November 25 to enact laws to enforce the state prohibition voted on November 5, which goes into effect January 1, and to ratify the national resolution.

There are thirty-two states that have not yet voted on the question. The legislatures of all of these states hold their regular sessions during this month of January. Twenty-one of these states are dry and will certainly ratify. These with the fifteen states that have already ratified will make the thirty-six necessary for success. Besides these the temperance people claim that in a number of wet states legislatures friendly to ratification were elected in November, among them Illinois, California, Missouri, Vermont, Minnesota, Wisconsin and others, with a possibility of friendly action in even Pennsylvania and New York. King Alcohol has been wounded almost to death; this month will deal him his death stab. It would not be surprising if forty states were to be secured by the end of January, and a year from that time the liquor traffic will have been removed from our fair land forever. The wet states that do not ratify this month will continue to vote on the proposition each year. With reference to the individual and the nation the people of America have said: "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging: and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise." (Prov. 20 : 1.)

Passing of the Horse

IS THE horse passing? Nearly every one will say certainly he is. The trolley has pushed the horse car off the track; the automobile has chased him off the avenues, and out of the parks; the motor trucks have shoved him away from the streets of trade, and before long he will entirely disappear. Now and then an antique horse comes down the avenue champing his bit, and prancing. But those who sorrow for the vanishing horse are all wrong. The horse is not passing at all. He was never more numerous or more efficient in service than now. The horse is passing, but only from the city to the country, where he is not seen by so many people. Our statement is verified by the following government statistics:

Number of Horses in the United States.

1860...	6,249,174	1910..	21,040,000
1870...	8,249,000	1915..	21,195,000
1880..	11,202,000	1916..	21,159,000
1890..	14,214,000	1917..	21,210,000

At no time since the mythical horses stood in the Augean stables has the horse rendered such valuable service to the world as in 1917. He helped win the world war. And when the monuments shall be erected to the memory of our boys, the finest warriors that ever marched across the fields of time, let not the sculptor forget the horse that fell with his rider in the battle, or the one that bore the gun and ammunition on his back and then died with the men who used them, and became, like them, a martyr to universal liberty. The horses that did not go to France stayed at home and raised food to carry on the war. The horse is as old as history. Horses were plentiful in Egypt, but we do not read much of them in Palestine until Solomon's time, when they were kept for war, while the oxen were used for tilling the fields: "And Solomon had forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen." (I Kings 4 : 26.)

Columbia Gets Polyclinic

AT A meeting of the Trustees of Columbia University, held recently, it was announced that the trustees of the New York Polyclinic Hospital had proposed to transfer the property of that institution to Columbia University, to be maintained and perpetuated for the public service and for advanced instruction and research in medicine and surgery. By the acceptance of this proposal the University would come into possession of a finely equipped hospital affording ample clinical facilities for the building up of graduate studies and research in medicine. The university authorities believe that it would then be possible to begin to make New York as much of a center for advanced medical study as Vienna and Paris have been in past years. The property is now in the hands of the Federal government as a military hospital, and will be utilized by Columbia as soon as the terms of peace shall have been agreed upon. The hospital, built in 1912, runs on Eighth and Ninth Avenues from Fiftieth to Fifty-first Street, is eleven stories high, and has capacity for 300 beds. It is the creation of Dr. John A. Wyeth and a group of friends, who many years ago started a movement which has reached its climax in the proposal to make the hospital a university institution for advanced study and investigation. Columbia already has the Sloane Hospital for women, one of the finest in the world, with its 131 beds, and the Vanderbilt Clinic, where more than 150,000 are annually treated. Columbia University is a child of the Church, as are many of the finest hospitals of the world, founded on the Christ, the Great Physician, who cured the bodies as well as the souls of men. "And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people." (Matt. 4 : 23.)

Living Dolls Christmas Presents

ON A special New York Central train one hundred real, live "Christmas Dolls" were dispatched to that many homes out West. The little ones are the gift of the New York Foundling Asylum to a hundred homes in the West, including the Mississippi Valley, the Southwest and the Northwest. The children, many of them with very sad stories, are influenza victims whose parents died and left them homeless. Though death and sorrow have shaded the pictured group, the faces of the dear little ones are bright and beautiful and sweet. It is gracious of these homes in the West to open their doors and take these little orphans and make them their own. Nearly a half million victims have already died from influenza in this country, and the care for the helpless orphans from this plague is a beautiful charity. There are some of the homes where these little ones go to which God has not given children, and they will adopt them and make them their own, and as the years of mutual service and love go by, they will be so cemented in affection that the children will say "father" and "mother" and mean it, and the new father and mother will say "my child" and mean it. In a few years from now these parents would not take a farm for the little boy or girl they took as a Christian charity, but which God gave to them as a priceless treasure. They are imitating Christ who loved little children and "took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them." (Mark 10 : 16.)

A Skeleton Keeps Time

THERE are many stories of skeletons in the closet; this one is of a skeleton in the clock. It is in the possession of an Indian prince. It has no dial, only a round disk to which numerous little bells are attached. Its mere sight at every full hour is sufficient to strike awe into nervous persons, for this uncanny clock indicates the hour by taking the form of a skeleton, seizing a bone and striking the bells as often as there are hours to be indicated. This done the skeleton falls to pieces. An English banker in London recently offered the prince $5,000 for his clock, but the offer was declined. To inspire a proper sense of the brevity of time and the certainty of eternity, some of the ancients had the figure of death holding an hourglass in his hand. Not only this clock of the prince, whose skeleton strikes the bells with a bone to mark the hours, but all clocks, teach how swiftly the hours go, how rapidly the years chase each other. "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom." (Ps. 90 : 12.)

King's Chaplain Killed

KING GEORGE of England has just lost his chaplain. The only clergyman to win the coveted Victoria Cross, D. S. O., and M. C. in the world war, the Rev. Theodore Hardy, was over fifty years of age and a former Nottingham schoolmaster. King George took a special interest in this V. C. clergyman. It is said that, recognizing that Mr. Hardy's age made life in the field especially trying, and fearing the risks of battle for the gallant man, who had already gone through so much in his zeal for his troops, His Majesty was especially anxious that he should seek preferment at home. He was appointed one of the king's domestic chaplains, but he could not be induced to leave the troops while the war continued, and he met his death from wounds in their midst. The hero was a blessed minister of the Son of God, and worked not for his salary or his personal ease, or for fame, which was secure, but for others, for his country and his God, and in his martyrdom imitated his Master and the disciples whom Jesus loved, who said: "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren." (I John 3 : 16.)

John Cameron's eyes met those of Ruth Macdonald

CHAPTER I

TWO young men in officer's uniform entered the smoker of a suburban train, and after the usual formalities settled back to enjoy their ride out to Bryne Haven.

"What d'ye think of that girl I introduced you to the other night, Harry? Isn't she a 'peach'?" said the second lieutenant, taking a luxurious puff at his cigarette.

"I should say, Bobbie, she's some girl! I certainly owe you one for a good time."

"Don't speak of it, Harry. Come on with me tonight and try it again. I'm going to see her friend, and I can get her over the phone any time. She's just crazy about you. What do you say? Shall I call her up?"

"Well, hardly tonight, Bob," said the first lieutenant thoughtfully. "She's a 'peach' all right; but the fact is, Bob, I've decided to marry Ruth Macdonald, and I haven't much time left before I go over. I think I'll have to get things sort of fixed up tonight, you see. Perhaps, later— But no! I guess that wouldn't do. Ruth's folks are rather fussy about such things. It might get out. No, Bob, I'll have to forego the pleasures you offer me this time."

The second lieutenant sat up and whistled:

"You've decided to marry Ruth Macdonald!" he ejaculated, staring. "But has Ruth Macdonald decided to marry you?"

"I hardly think there'll be any trouble about that when I get ready to propose," smiled the first lieutenant complacently, as he lolled back in his seat. "You seem surprised," he added.

"Well, rather!" said the other dryly, still staring.

"What's there so surprising about that?" The first lieutenant was enjoying the sensation he was creating. He knew that the second lieutenant had always been "sweet" on Ruth Macdonald.

"Well, you know, Harry, you're a pretty bad one!" said the second lieutenant uneasily, a flush beginning to rise in his face. "I didn't think you'd have the nerve. She's a pretty fine girl, you know. She's unusual!"

"Exactly. Don't you suppose I want a fine girl when I marry?"

"I don't believe you're really going to do it!" burst forth the second lieutenant. "In fact, I don't believe I'll let you do it, if you try!"

"You couldn't stop me, Bob," with an amiable sneer. "One word from you, young man, and I'd put your captain wise about where you were the last time you overstayed your leave and got away with it. You know I've got a pull with your captain. It never pays for the pot to call the kettle black."

The second lieutenant sat back sullenly with a deep red color in his cheeks.

"You're no angel yourself, Bob. See? And I'm going to marry Ruth Macdonald next week and get a ten days' leave! Put that in your pipe and smoke it!"

The first lieutenant lay back in his seat again in satisfied triumph, and there ensued a long and pregnant silence between the two. One glance at the second lieutenant showed that he was most effectually silenced.

THE front door of the car slammed open and shut, and a tall slim officer, with touches of silver about the edges of his dark hair and a look of command in his kind keen eyes, came crisply down the aisle. The two young lieutenants sat up with a jerk and an undertone of oaths, and prepared to salute as he passed them. The captain gave them a quick searching glance as he saluted, and went on to the next car.

The two jerked out salutes more or less abjectly and settled back uneasily.

"That man gives me a pain!" said Harry Wainwright, preparing to soothe his ruffled spirits by a fresh cigarette.

"He's so good himself he has to pry into other people's business and try to make them like him. It beats me how he ever got to be a captain, a prim old fossil like him!"

"It might puzzle some people to know how you got your commission, Harry. You're no fossil, but you're no angel either, and there are some things in your career that aren't exactly laid down in military manuals."

"Oh, my Uncle Henry looked after that. Why, I've got some of the biggest men in the country to back me. I thought I'd croak when I read some of their recommendations; they were so gushing in their praise, you'd have died laughing, Bob, if you could have seen them. They had such adjectives as "estimable, moral, active, efficient," and one even went so far as to say I was equally distinguished for my scholarship and my work in athletics."

The two laughed loudly over this.

"But your college records, Harry, how'd you get around them?"

"Oh, mother sent a good fat check to establish a new scholarship when she wrote for them. She fixed that up all right!"

"Lucky dog!" said the other,. "Now, I am just the other way. I never try to put a thing over but what I get caught."

"You worry too much, Bobbie! And you don't take a chance! Now I—"

THE front door of the car opened and shut and a tall young fellow in workman's clothes, with a finely cut face, entered. He gave one quick glance down the car as though he was hunting for some one, and came walking down the aisle. The sight of him stopped the boast on young Wainwright's tongue and an angry flush grew and rolled up from the top of his immaculate olive-drab collar to his close military hair-cut.

Slowly, deliberately, John Cameron walked down the aisle of the car looking keenly from side to side, scanning each face alertly, until his eyes lighted on the two young officers. At Bob Wetherill he merely glanced knowingly, but he fixed his eyes on young Wainwright with a steady, amused, contemptuous gaze as he came toward him; a gaze so noticeable that it would not fail to arrest the attention of any who were looking; and he finished the affront with a lingering turn of his head as he passed by, and a slight accentuation of the amusement as he finally lifted his gaze and passed on out of the rear door of the car.

Those who were sitting in the seats near the door might have heard the words "And they killed such men as Lincoln!" uttered in a laughing tone of audible meditation before the door slammed shut.

Wainwright uttered a low oath of imprecation and flung his half-spent cigarette on the floor testily:

"Did you see that, Bob?" he complained furiously. "If I don't get that fellow!"

"What's eating him, anyway? He isn't a very easy fellow to get, you know. He has the reputation—"

"Oh, I know! Yes, I guess, anyhow, I know!"

"Oh, I see! Licked you once, too, did he?" laughed Wetherill. "What had you been up to?"

"Oh, I called his father a name he didn't like very much, and he lit into me. Good night! I thought when he got going it was the end of Little Harry! I was sick for a week after he got through with me. He certainly is one brute! Of course, at first I didn't realize, or I'd have given him one that would have finished him. I could have, you know! I've been trained! But I didn't want to hurt the fellow and get into the papers. The circumstances were peculiar just then—"

"I see! You'd just applied for Officer's Training Camp?"

"Exactly, and you know you never can tell what rumor a person like that can start, and he is keen enough to see the advantage he had all right and follow it up."

"Oh, yes, he's keen all right!"

"Well, I've got him now, just wait! If I don't make him bite the dust! Ye gods! When I think of the way he looks at me every time he sees me now, I could skin him alive!"

"I fancy he'd be rather slippery to skin," reflected the other seriously. "I wouldn't like to try it, Harry!"

"Well, but wait till you see where I've got him! He's in the draft. He goes next week. And they're sending all those men to our camp! He'll be a private, of course, and he'll have to salute me! Won't that gall him?"

A PLEDGE

IT IS with real pleasure that I wish the readers of the Christian Herald a Happy and Prosperous New Year. The history of the good you have done and are doing in the world through the Christian Herald reads like a romance. Your generosity sent the first relief ship to stricken Belgium; you are known and loved around the globe for your works of mercy and relief. The Bowery Mission and Mont-Lawn are living monuments to your wise foundations.

A LACE industry founded and financed by you, to give employment to the destitute women of war-ridden Jerusalem, has developed into a self-supporting industry. This is a splendid example of the far-sighted policies for which the Christian Herald charities have become famous and of which we are all proud. The Christian Herald is a living, breathing power for good and an ever-increasing influence in the world.

AS I take the leadership of this wonderful publication, I feel the thrill of a big opportunity. There is a new spirit of cooperation and service sweeping over the world. It is being reflected in our business relations, in our church work and in our homes. Master thinkers in the religious field will help Christian Herald readers to interpret this new spirit — for we must take a leading part in this movement.

I HAVE many new plans in view for Christian Herald readers. For one thing, I am very anxious to interest more of the younger members of the family. I am convinced that we cannot overestimate the importance of giving them good reading. Personally, I would greatly value your cooperation in this purpose.

WE ARE going to publish a Short Story in every issue, which will compete in interest with the best stories in other magazines, and of such dependability that you will be glad to have your family read them.

I AM proud of the Christian Herald organization. Dr. Sandison and his associates love the Christian Herald and are very jealous of its good name. I hope that I may be worthy of the confidence which they are so freely giving me. I pledge to them, as I now pledge to you, a loyalty of purpose that will keep the Christian Herald true to its high mission and make it an even greater power for good.

Graham Patterson

President and Publisher of the Christian Herald.

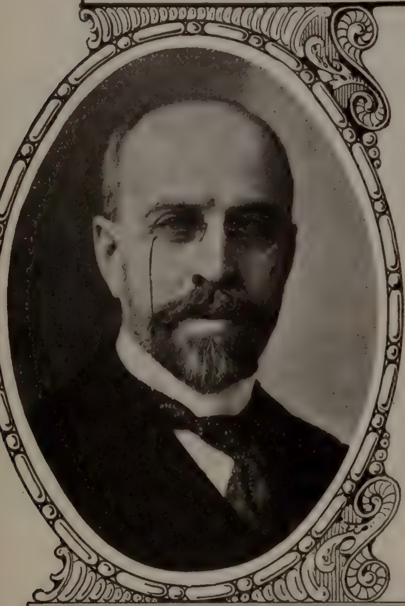
SOME DISTINCTIVE FEATURES



Dr. Gray's New Series Begin Jan. 15

ACCEDING to the urgent request of many readers, we have asked Dr. Gray to add final Series of articles as a close to his illuminating contributions on Prophecy. He l now well under way a number of these articles, the first two of which are in han They are entitled "How to Interpret Prophecy," and "Two Great Laws of Prophetic Int pretation." The first of these will appear in the January 15th issue. There are four ad tional articles, which have a direct relation to the war as an interpretation of the divine Wo This is particularly the case in the articles entitled, "How the Jewish Nation Will Bless t World," "How the War Fulfills Prophecy," "How Germany's Defeat Will Transfo Europe," and "Russia and the World Problem of the Jews."

Our readers will welcome the new series of articles by Dr. Gray, whose prophetical positions in the Christian Herald have won the approval of a host of Bible-lovers.

Church Unity After the War

"SHALL the Churches unite to combat the forces of sin and win the world for Christ This is the great soul-stirring question which is now uppermost in the minds of millio today. Pulpit and pew and outsider are all discussing it—learned Professors, orthod theologians and noted Evangelists—people of all intellectual ranks and grades, from the eloque preacher down to the humblest worshipper. Many denominational leaders are outspoken in favor of such a union of organizations as will enable all to work together on Gospel lin Some would save the denominational appellation, while others go so far as to declare that sacrifice whatsoever is too great to secure the successful carrying out of the divine idea of a tru united Church. Dr. H. K. Carroll has summed up the work of the Philadelphia Conferenc representing fifteen great denominations, in these words: "It should be; it can be; it MUST be —a deeply rooted sentiment in favor of complete Unity. Every step in the great battle is record in the Christian Herald from week to week, and will continue until the climax is reached. Yo own denomination is involved in this struggle. Its attitude and its decision you will find record in these pages.

Margaret Sangster's Letters from France

MISS MARGARET SANGSTER, whose poems and stories in the Christian Herald have won a host of hearty admirers, will very soon be writing a series of human interest sketches from France, as she finds it after the war. She is now in Paris, the center of world interest, and in close touch with the most important living characters and most vital events of all history. She will feel with rich sympathy the sufferings of that devastated country and write with true appreciation of the heroic endurance and sacrifice that have held that beloved people through to victory.

Miss Sangster is richly endowed with the freshness of a girl and the wisdom of a woman. She will sense things in their true aspect and proportion. Through exclusive interviews she will give us the personal utterances of the greatest statesmen on the vital topic of world peace; she will also give us the heart messages of the widows and orphans who have known the real terrors of war and who are praying fervently for a peace that is just and lasting.

The high qualities of heart and mind of Miss Sangster will be applied to this task. It is as great an opportunity as any writer ever had. Her weekly letters will be of enduring interest and value.

A Short Story Every Issue

A SHORT Story Every Week is the new order for the coming year, and each one must be up to the highest mark. The Short Stories will be in addition to the regular serials and together they will afford a new feast of fiction. The very best stories available are being selected. Charming stories are already in hand from such favorite writers as Annie Hamilton Donnell, George Gilbert, Jean Mahan Plank, Edgar White and Eliza Pope Van Dyne; while many other popular writers will be constantly contributing their best work, during the coming year. The Christian Herald Short Story is of distinctively high class, clean and worthwhile.

Subscription Price of the Christian Herald Is Now $2.50 a Year

FROM today, January 1, 1919, the yearly Subscription Price of the Christian Herald will be $2.50. This is a step made absolutely necessary by the increased cost of labor, white paper, postage, and all that goes into the production of the publication.

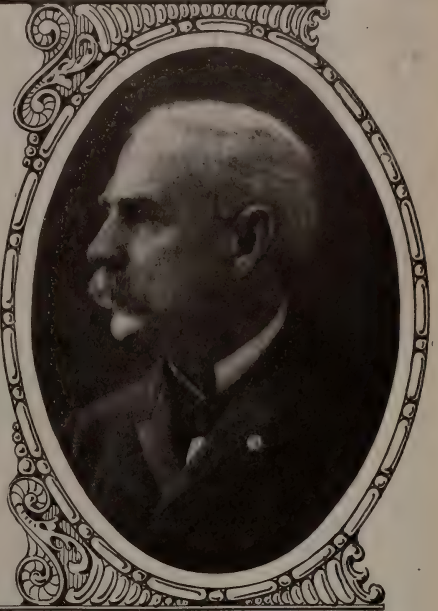
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD IN 1919

Dr. Clark's Life Story

DR. FRANCIS E. CLARK, founder and president of the Christian Endeavor, is giving, through the Christian Herald, reminiscences of his gloriously active and abundantly fruitful lifework at home and abroad. How the Christian Endeavor originated and was developed is told in a direct and charming way. It is fascinating reading, showing how the humblest effort, made with faith and trust and hope, quickened the seedling of a mighty tree.

Dr. Clark's story of China emerging from chaos is delightful and illuminating. "I have had the privilege," he says, "of visiting China four times within the last twenty-six years, and had I been told on my first visit, in 1892, that in less than a quarter of a century the Manchus would be deposed, China would be a republic, the country would be gridironed with railways, hundreds of newspapers would spring up, the opium trade would be abolished, her immemorial educational system changed, and an effective army and police force established, we would have said, like the king of old, 'If God would open the windows of heaven, might this thing be.' Yet all these betterments and more have taken place." His travels and work in Russia make an equally important document.

Dr. Clark, in these reminiscences, writes in the same direct and forceful way in which he works. The various instalments, one of which will appear every other week, will give rare pleasure and inspiration.



An Enlarged Christian Herald

THE size of the Christian Herald will be considerably increased. There will be at least four pages more to the average issue this year. This will allow us to introduce more literary and timely features. There will be a wider range of articles, covering more completely the present great religious movements for Christian unity which have come out of the war. Enlargement means with us also improvement in quality to the very limit of the ability of the best writers and artists available. It is the sincere aim of the new management to keep the Christian Herald the leading religious home newspaper of the world.

Mrs. Lutz's New Serial "The Search"

GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL (Mrs. Lutz), well known to our readers of fiction through "The Witness," "The Measure of a Man," and her other popular serials, has now written for us "The Search," a clean-cut inspiring story of war, love and religion. "The Search" comes fresh to us with the vibrant thrill of battle, the warm heart-beat of true but troubled love and the spiritually exalting and cleansing search of a soldier's soul after God. This master of dramatic situation and of human emotion has written "The Search" especially for Christian Herald readers; we confidently believe it is her best story. Its publication begins in this issue of the Christian Herald and will continue for many weeks. It will be beautifully illustrated and the instalments will be generous.

John Cameron, the hero of "The Search," measures up to the most romantic standards of military heroism and of manhood. At the risk of his life and at the cost of severe wounds, he rescues from an inferno of death at the battle front the man whom he has good cause to hate. He is as worthy in love as in war, and the lovely Ruth McDonald sees that the boy born beneath her own station in life has developed into the noblest of men.

Beautiful Covers in Colors

CHRISTIAN HERALD covers, which have long won praise, will be even better than ever, both in selection of subjects and quality of art. The covers adapted to the seasons, to the holidays and to great timely movements will be especially made for us by the best artists. There will be wide variety. Ortlip's scriptural interpretations will continue to appear on occasion, as will Rising's water colors from nature, and Alphaeus P. Cole has contributed a beautiful sacred picture. David Roberts' famous paintings of the Holy Land will appear from time to time. There will also be fine photographs in color of natural subjects and events of human interest.

A Word About Delays and Complaints Which Our Readers Will Understand

THIS is the time of the year when the Christian Herald's subscription mail comes in like a flood. Shortage of skilled labor, due to the influenza and other uncontrollable causes makes the prompt filling of subscriptions and book orders difficult. We are doing our best. Please refrain from sending in complaints.

CHRISTIAN HERALD BOOKS

"JERUSALEM—Its Redemption and Future"

IT IS only now that the real story of the Redemption of Jerusalem can be told and it is that story which the Christian Herald presents in the book entitled "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future." It tells the story in vivid detail of conditions in the Holy City during the war.

The book reads like the unfolding of a vast drama, one of the grandest ever known. The redemption is not confined to Palestine, but includes all the Bible lands: Syria, Armenia, Arabia, Mesopotamia, the old country of the patriarchs, and even the "Eden Land"—the cradle of the human race. It is a volume which should be in the possession of every Christian man and woman in America, as it is plentifully illuminative of the fulfilment of God's pledge which is being brought about in a remarkable way in our lifetime. Illustrated with fifteen pages of beautiful pictures from the Holy Land.

We will send a copy of "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.00.

We will send a copy of "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.50.

"Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," separately, $1.00 per copy, postpaid.

"Oh, Money! Money!"

By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna," etc.

"OH, MONEY! MONEY!" is a romance of a New England Cinderella and a Western millionaire. "If you don't know how to get happiness out of five dollars, you don't know how to get it out of five thousand," says Maggie, the cheery philosopher of "Oh, Money! Money!" and this is the keynote of Mrs. Porter's latest story. Out of a clear sky came three checks to the three Blaisdell families. How each family tried in its own way to get happiness from its unexpected fortune—and failed; and how Poor Maggie, without trying and without a fortune, succeeded, is told in "Oh, Money! Money!"

We will send a copy of "Oh, Money! Money!" postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.00.

We will send a copy of "Oh, Money! Money!" postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.50.

"Oh, Money! Money!" separately, $1.50 per copy, postpaid.

Gene Stratton-Porter's Novels

Special Edition of Six Volumes

BY a special arrangement with the publishers of Mrs. Porter's works, we procured a special edition of six volumes of the most popular stories by this talented writer. The first edition of these books was quickly taken by our readers. Another edition has just been received. The six volumes were printed from the plates used in the original edition—the type being large and clear and the paper of exceptional quality. The books are bound in fine cloth with gilt tops—twenty-five full-page illustrations.

We have only a limited number of this second edition, and when they are taken we cannot print any more, as the government prohibits the use of the special quality paper used in this edition. Those who desire this set of six volumes should order them at once.

The titles are as follows: "At the Foot of the Rainbow"; "The Harvester"; "The Girl of the Limberlost"; "Freckles"; "Laddie—A True-Blue Story"; and "Song of the Cardinal."

We will send this set of 6 volumes of Mrs. Porter's books, prepaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $5.00. Payment can be made in 5 monthly installments of $1.00 each if preferred.

"Light on Prophecy"

Report of the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY" links up the prophecies of the Bible with the great events of today and shows conclusively that we are living in an age of prophetic fulfilment. When we set out several months ago to print "Light on Prophecy," we felt that it was a book which our readers would welcome. It held something that very many good people want to know. The result, however, far exceeded our expectations. "Light on Prophecy" has now passed through four large editions, and the demand is still growing. The book contains all the notable addresses on prophecy delivered at the Philadelphia Bible Conference a few months ago, which was the most important gathering of its kind ever held in this country or perhaps in the world.

We will send a copy of "Light on Prophecy," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.00.

We will send a copy of "Light on Prophecy," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.50.

"Light on Prophecy," separately, $1.00 per copy, postpaid.

Killing a Million Armenians

Ambassador Morgenthau's Revelations

AS GERMANY is now suing for peace, it is important that the world should know some things she has tried to keep secret.

This inside history and much more, all significant and breathlessly interesting, is in "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story." This book tells why the Turks killed 1,000,000 Armenians and fixes on the Germans the responsibility for the atrocities. It reveals the perfidy of Germany's attempt to start a holy war against Christians. It is the kind of a book that keeps one reading on and on. It is entertainingly written, yet it is packed full of authoritative facts. Illustrated with photographs, maps and diagrams. Over 400 pages; cloth bound.

We will send a copy of "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.50.

We will send a copy of "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us TWO NEW yearly subscriptions at $2.50 each.

"Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," separately, $2.00 a copy.

"He won't do it! I know him, and he won't do it!"

"I'll take care that he does it all right! I'll put myself in his way and make him do it! I can, you know! And if he refuses I'll have him up and get him in the guardhouse. Then I guess he'll smile out of the other side of his mouth!"

"He won't likely be in your company."

"That doesn't make any difference. I can get him into trouble if he isn't, but I'll try to work it that he is if I can. I've got pull, you know, and I know how to work my superiors!" swaggered Wainwright.

"That isn't very good policy," advised the other. "I've heard of men picking off officers they didn't like when it came to battle."

"I'm not afraid of John Cameron!" bellowed Wainwright pridefully. "I'll take good care that he's in front of me on all such occasions!"

THEN he turned to look up at two men who were passing in the aisle, and suddenly drew himself up with a crimson wave of mortification and saluted the captain, who was returning and looking sharply down into his face. Behind him walked John Cameron, with still that same lingering look of amusement on his face. It was plain he had heard the first lieutenant's words. But he walked on without further comment, giving attention to something the captain was saying to him.

The young officers were so much overwhelmed at first by the encounter that they sat bolt upright and said nothing until the door slammed behind the captain and Cameron. Then Wainwright spoke in a low shaken growl:

"Now what in thunder is Captain LaRue going on to Bryne Haven for? I thought, of course, he got off at Spring Heights. You don't suppose he's going up to Ruth Macdonald's, do you? You know they're related. If he is it's all up with me for tonight. I'd have to sit at attention all the evening, and I couldn't propose with that cad around!"

"Well, if he does, you can put it off and come with me just once more," soothed his friend. "Athalie Britt will make you forget your troubles all right, all right!"

"And how then did John Cameron come to be on speaking terms with Captain LaRue, I'd like to know?" mused Wainwright, paying no heed to his sympathizer.

"H'm! That does complicate matters some, doesn't it? Captain LaRue is down at your camp, too, isn't he? Why, I suppose he knew him up at college, perhaps. I remember hearing that the Captain came up here every week last winter from the university to lecture."

Young Wainwright threw away his cigarette and sat up frowning and muttering a chain of choice expletives known only to his kind.

"Forget it!" encouraged his friend, slapping him vigorously on his shoulder as the train drew into Bryne Haven. "Come off that grouch and get busy! You're on leave, man! If you can't visit one woman there's plenty more, and time enough to get married, too, before you go to France!"

BY THE fitful flare of the station electrics they could see, as they got off the train, that the Captain and young Cameron were walking together just ahead, in the attitude of familiar converse. The sight did not serve to put the young lieutenant into a better humor.

At the great gate of the Macdonald estate Cameron and LaRue parted.

"I'll attend to it the first thing in the morning, Cameron, and I'm glad you spoke to me about it!" the Captain's tones rang through the night. "I shall be personally pleased if that arrangement can be made. Good night and good luck to you!"

The two young officers halted at a discreet distance while John Cameron turned off to the right and walked away into the darkness. The captain's quick steps crunched along the gravel drive to the Macdonald house.

"Well, I guess that about settles me for tonight, Bobbie," sighed the first lieutenant. "I'll go with you and pass the time away. I'll stop at the drug store and make a date with Ruth Macdonald for tomorrow morning. Wonder where I can get a car to take her out? No, I don't want to take her own car, because she always wants to run it, and when you're proposing to a woman you don't want her to be absorbed in running a car. See?"

"I don't know. I haven't had so much experience as you have, Harry, but I should think it might be inconvenient," laughed the other. They went back together toward the station. A few moments later Wainwright emerged from the telephone booth in the drug store with a lugubrious look on his face:

"She says she's promised to go to church with her cousin LaRue tomorrow morning, and she's busy all the rest of the day. She's promised to give me next Saturday, though, if I can get leave off." He brightened with the memory. "I guess I can make it. If I can't do anything else I'll tell 'em I'm coming up to be married, and then I'll make her rush things through. I'm not sure but that would be best after all! She's the kind of a girl that will help you out of a fix that way, and I'll just tell her I had to say I was getting married in order to get the leave. How about it?"

"Well, that's all right, Harry, if you can get away with it. But now come on. It's getting late. What say if we get up a party and run down to Atlantic Sunday, now you're free? I know those two girls would jump at the chance, especially Athalie. She's a Westerner, you know, and has never seen the ocean."

"All right, come on. Only you must promise me you won't get me into any scrapes that will come back to Bryne Haven. You know there's lots of people go to Atlantic this time of year, and I'm not going to have any stories coming back. I'm going to marry Ruth Macdonald!"

"All right. Come on!"

CHAPTER II

RUTH MACDONALD drew up her little electric runabout sharply at the crossing, as the gates suddenly clanged down in her way, and sat back with an annoyed look on her face.

Michael of the crossing was so overcareful sometimes that it became trying. She had supposed there was plenty of time to cross before the down train. She glanced at her tiny wrist watch and frowned. Why, it was fully five minutes before the train was due! What could Michael mean, standing there with his flag so importantly with that determined look upon his face?

She glanced down the platform and was surprised to find a crowd. There must be a special. What was it? A convention of some sort, or a picnic? It was late in the season for picnics. Who were they, anyway? She looked them over, and was astonished to find people of every class, the workers, the wealthy, the plain people, men, women and children; and a strange seriousness was upon them. As she looked closer she saw tears on some faces, and handkerchiefs were everywhere in evidence. Had some one died? Was this a funeral train they were awaiting? Strange she had not heard!

Then the band burst out upon her with a familiar wail,

"There's a long, long trail a-winding
Into the land of our dreams—" and behind came the muffled, broken tramping of feet not accustomed to marching together.

Ruth suddenly sat up very straight and began to watch. This must be the first draft men just going away! She had heard it spoken about but had not thought much of it. She had no friends whom it touched. They had all taken warning in plenty of time and found themselves a commission somewhere, two of them getting matters settled up only two or three days before. She had thought of these draft men, if she had thought of them at all, only when she saw mention of them in the newspapers, and then as a lot of workingmen or farmers' boys. Now she watched them curiously, and found to her astonishment that she knew many of them. There were three college fellows in the front ranks whom she knew slightly. The sister of one of them stood on the sidewalk quite near to the runabout, and seemed to have forgotten that a crowd was by. Her face was drenched with tears and her lips were quivering. Behind her was a gray-haired woman with a skewy blouse, and a black skirt that was too long for the fashion. The tears were trickling down her cheeks also, and an old man with a crutch seemed to belong to their party. His lips were set and he was looking at the boys with his heart in his eyes.

RUTH shrank back, not to intrude upon such open sorrow, and glanced at the line again, as they straggled down the road to the platform; fifty grave-eyed, serious young men, with determined mien, and sorrow in the very droop of their shoulders. One could see how they hated all this display and publicity, this tense moment of farewell in the eyes of all the town, and yet how tender they felt toward those dear ones who had gathered thus to do them honor as they went away to do their part in the great world-struggle for liberty!

As she looked the girl saw that they were not mature men, as at first glance they seemed, but some of them were mere boys. There was the boy that mowed the Macdonald lawn, and the yellow-haired fellow who brought the groceries. There was the gasman and the nice young plumber, and the boy from the post office, and the cashier from the bank! What made them look so old at first? Why, it was as if sorrow and responsibility had suddenly been put upon them like a garment that morning for uniform, and they walked in the shadow of the great sadness that had come upon the world. She understood that perhaps even up to the very night before they had most of them been merry, careless boys; but now they were men, made in a night by the horrible Sin that had brought about this thing called War.

For the first time since the war began Ruth Macdonald had a vision of what it all meant to the individuals that made up the world. She had been knitting with all the rest, she had spent long mornings at the Red Cross rooms—she was on her way there this very minute when Michael and the procession interrupted her course—she had made miles of surgical dressings and picked tons of oakum. She had bade her men friends good-bys when they went away to Officers' Training-Camps, and welcomed and admired them with the other girls when they returned in full uniform on furloughs, one by one winning his stripes and commission. They were all men whom she had known in society. They had wealth and position, and found it easy to get into the kind of thing in the army or navy that pleased them. The danger seemed a negligible quantity. It was the fashion to look on it that way. Ruth had never thought anything about it before. She had even been severe about a few mothers who worried about their sons and wanted to get them exempt in some way. But these stern, loyal mothers who stood in close ranks with heavy lines of sacrifice upon their faces and tears on their cheeks and love and self-abnegation in their eyes gave her a new view of the world. These were the ones who were going to suffer! Not the gay ones who looked upon the war as a game, and had plenty of money to play it in the most creditable fashion. These were the ones who would be in actual poverty, some of them, without their boys, and whose lives would be empty indeed when they went forth. Not but that the rich would suffer too, of course; but somehow it was made so much easier for them in so many ways. Ruth Macdonald had never realized the war before, had never realized how anybody would suffer until she saw the faces of those women with their sons and brothers and lovers; until she saw the faces of the boys, for the moment all the rollicking lightness gone, and only the pain of parting and the mists of the unknown future in their eyes.

IT CAME to the girl with a sudden pang that she was left out of all this. That really it made little difference to her whether America was in the war or not. Her life would go on just the same, a pleasant monotony of bustle and amusement. There would be the same round of social affairs and regular engagements, spiced with the excitement of war-work and occasional visiting uniforms. There was no one going forth to fight whose going would put out the light of her life for a season and cause her to feel sad, beyond the ordinary superficial sadness for one's acquaintances. She liked them all, her friends, and shrank from having them in danger, although it was splendid to have them doing something real at last. In truth until this moment the danger had seemed so remote; the casualty list, that people spoke of with bated breath, so much a thing made of up vast numbers of unknown men, that it had scarcely come within her realization yet. But now she suddenly read it all in the eyes of these suffering women and girls who were met together to say good-by, perhaps a last good-by, to those who were dearer than life to them. How would she, Ruth Macdonald, feel if one of those boys were her brother or lover? It was inconceivably dreadful.

The band blared on, and the familiar words insisted themselves upon her unwilling mind:

"There's a long, long night of waiting!"

A sob at her right made her start and then turn away quickly from the sight of a mother's grief as she clung to a frail daughter's shoulder sobbing with utter abandon, while the daughter begged her to be calm "for Tom's sake."

It was all horrible! Why had she got into this situation? Aunt Rhoda would blame her for it. Aunt Rhoda would say it was too conspicuous, right there in the front ranks! She put her hand to the starter and glanced back, hoping to get away, but the way behind was blocked several deep with cars, and the crowd had closed in about her on every side. Retreat was impossible. However, she noticed with relief that the matter of being conspicuous need not disturb her. Nobody was looking her way. All eyes were turned in one direction, toward that straggling, determined line that wound up from the borough hall, past the post office and bank to the station where the Home Guards stood uniformed, in open, silent ranks, doing honor to the boys who were going to fight for them.

Ruth's eyes went reluctantly back to the marching line again. Somehow it struck her that they would not have seemed so forlorn if they had worn new, trig uniforms, instead of rusty, varied civilian clothes. They seemed like an ill-prepared sacrifice passing in review. Then suddenly her gaze was riveted upon a single figure, the last man in the procession, marching alone, with uplifted head and a look of self-abnegation on his strong young face. All at once something sharp seemed to slash through her soul and hold her with a long quiver of pain, and she sat looking straight

DR. WARD started up, before Bert finished speaking, and the Chaplain stopped in his tracks.

"Just the thing!" Dr. Ward cried out, as excited as a young man just seeing a great career open for himself. "The denominations are ready for that sort of challenge all over America. We have already agreed on a sensible division of our missionary forces. It's only a beginning, I know, but it's the opening of a new door to the world. Now all we need is a living voice to come along and focus all the longing for unity that exists, even in Bayview. And yours is the voice to do it, Hunter. You have come to the kingdom for such a time as this! There are scores, yes, hundreds, of towns like Bradford that have organized federated churches. It is not an untried experiment. You can go out over this country and give the practical illustrations of the feasibility of church union. It worked here. It will work in Bayview. And it must work all over the United States or we cannot win the world for Christ."

Hunter still stood in the spot where he had paused at Dr. Ward's first exclamation.

The group in the study watched him eagerly. Sometimes the most compelling issues of a man's life are focused into a single moment of decision. Such a moment had come to Chaplain Hunter. It was not two minutes after Dr. Ward had suggested his course that Hunter was saying:

"I'll do it! It is a crusade worth a life."

"And of course you can have the powerful support and backing of the Federal Council of Churches of America," Dr. Ward said as quietly as if Hunter's decision were a commonplace matter of fact not needing to be discussed.

Hunter was not unduly excited over this conference. He stayed to dinner and afterward with Dr. Ward in the little study went over many details that were afterward worked out. His boundless enthusiasm, his absolute convictions as to the need of the crusade, his power to express the common need of unity, all fused into a white heat of expression and practical doing. And when he finally took his leave, Dr. Ward exclaimed, in the fulness of his feeling.

"Hunter, the baptism of the Spirit is on you! Go in the greatness of that power, and nothing can defeat you!"

IT WAS late in the afternoon of this memorable Monday when Dick came down from his room and stepped out on the porch to go down the street on an errand. The Evening Journal lay there where the carrier had thrown it, and the big headlines stared up at him as he pulled the paper open and read:

Rufus Randall's Appeal Denied. Sentence of Ten Years in Federal Prison Must Be Carried Out. The President Alone Has Power to Set Aside Final Sentence. Very Doubtful if He Will Act.

Dick caught other sentences: "Sake of Example," "Severe Punishment," "Others Implicated."

He stepped back into the house and went into the study with the paper. His father was finishing some notes he and Hunter had been going over.

He took the paper and read the account of Randall's fate, Dick sitting there white-lipped and miserable.

"The President will never interfere, will he, father?"

"No. The country clamors for an example, and it has one in Randall."

At the supper table Randall's case was subject of family discussion. With the usual Ward frankness even Dick's relations to Requa were a part of the problem raised by Randall's trouble, and Mr. Ward and Esther and Bert, who was present, all expressed their open sympathy, but no one could express what the whole affair meant to Dick more than to any one else in the circle.

LATE that night (afterward Dr. Ward remembered hearing the town hall clock strike ten just as the door bell rang) he went to the door in answer to the summons. Mrs. Ward and Esther were upstairs. Dick had gone out to meet with Bert and others of Company 241 to talk over plans, and Dr. Ward was alone downstairs.

It was Rufus Randall. Dr. Ward asked him into the study and shut the door.

Randall seemed to be out of breath as if he had been running.

Dr. Ward quietly sat in his accustomed seat at his desk, waiting for Randall to speak.

What he said was so remarkable that Dr. Ward at first did not grasp its full meaning.

"Dr. Ward, I have come to you to ask if you will go to the President and ask him to pardon me. Will you?"

Randall was leaning forward, one big hand on his knee and the other gripping the arm of the chair. His heavy face was moist with sweat, and he eyed Dr. Ward with a fearful look as he waited for his answer.

As Dr. Ward did not reply at once to Randall's remarkable request, he put it again.

"I know it must seem like a ridiculous thing to ask, but I can't go to prison. Really, Dr. Ward, I don't feel personally responsible for Albert's death. You know well enough I couldn't foresee that he—"

STILL Dr. Ward did not say anything, and Randall, his face distorted and pleading, his whole body trembling with the torment of fear, stammered—

"You understand me, don't you, doctor? I couldn't come to you with a request like this if I was guilty. How could I know that defective parts of planes would go into a machine that Albert would fly? It is monstrous to believe it."

"And yet, the government proved that the defective parts were not the work of German operatives, but that you allowed defective material to be used because it was cheaper and more easily obtained," Dr. Ward at last replied. And for a moment he felt the righteous wrath of one of the old prophets confronting a concrete wrong—not simply a wrong that had touched his own life in a painful way, but a wrong that put dishonor on the name of patriotism and made it harder to live for every citizen.

"But I could not supervise or superintend all the machines that were made. Why doesn't the government arrest and condemn the foremen and others who really did the work—"

Randall was so pitiful in his childish attempts to excuse his own greed that Dr. Ward found himself feeling a sort of contempt for his appearance. His big form was doubled up in the chair and his face was discolored with passion, fear, shame, but not remorse—guilt, self-pity and rage all striving in the man's stricken soul for expression. Ward could not recall when a more pitiable creature had been in his study, and in the course of the years a large number of people had sat there unburdening their souls and seeking advice or consolation. But this man was seeking neither. He was after his own welfare as he had always been.

The study door suddenly opened and Mrs. Ward made a step into the room. She saw and recognized Randall, and as he started to rise she exclaimed, "You here, Rufus Randall!" Then to her husband she said, "John, I thought you were alone. I came in to get Albert's picture. Esther and I want to make a better frame for it."

She went up to the doctor's desk and took the picture with the framed letter beside it and started to go out. She was so close to Randall that as he stumblingly rose he brushed against her.

Mrs. Ward recoiled from him as if he were some unclean creature. For suddenly it seemed to sweep over her all at once that this man was the direct or indirect cause of her firstborn son's death. If it had not been for the defective material used in the airplane which had come out of Rufus Randall's mills Albert might even now be alive. And she had loved her firstborn with a devotion and a passion which was equaled only by her husband's unspoken affection for Richard.

Mrs. Ward's manner affected Rufus Randall curiously. His mind seemed suddenly to turn irritably to the days before the war when many people were discussing the sacrifices of their sons more than their service for freedom's sake. And he spoke in his embarrassment hardly conscious of the effect his words might have on the heart of this constantly mourning mother.

"Madam, you did not have to give your son. He might have remained at home if you—"

"Stop!" Mrs. Ward spoke sharply, and then as if moved by a sudden recollection of the boy's voluntary enlistment before he was drafted, she said softly, quoting the poet's lines—

God gave my son in trust to me;
Christ died for him, and he should be
A man for Christ. He is his own,
And God's and man's, not mine alone;
He was not mine to give. He gave Himself that he might help to save
All that a Christian might revere,
All that enlightened men hold dear.
It matters not where some men live;
If my dear son his life must give,
Hosannas I will sing for him,
E'en though my eyes with tears be dim.
And now the war is over, now
His gallant comrades home again,
I'll cheer them as they're marching by,
Rejoicing that they did not die.
And when his vacant place I see,
My heart will bound with joy that he
Was mine so long—my fair young son—
And cheer for him whose work is done!

SHE did not speak another word to Randall, who had shrunk back from her, and she was going out of the study when Dr. Ward said,

"Sarah, Mr. Randall has come to ask me to beg the President to pardon him. What shall we do with his request?"

"What! You come to ask that of us!"

"Yes, Mrs. Ward." Randall spoke doggedly. "I cannot go to prison. I cannot!"

"Better men than you have gone," Mrs. Ward said with unwonted bitterness. The next moment she had walked over to the side of her husband.

"Oh, John, do not ask me to answer. I trust your wisdom and mercy. I am not equal to this. Let me go and pray for the strength I lack."

Like a girl wife, as she had when a bride, she laid her head on the doctor's breast and sobbed, holding the boy's picture close, and for a few moments her cry was the only sound in the little room. Then she went out, and Rufus Randall breathed heavily as she closed the door.

CHAPTER TEN

AT FIRST Randall did not seem to hear what Dr. Ward was saying.

"Rufus Randall, I am perfectly willing to ask the President to pardon you, but I don't think it will be of any use."

"What is that?" Randall had resumed his seat, but he now struggled up again, gripping the arms of the chair hard.

"I say I am willing to do what you ask, but I am very certain the President will not pardon you. There is a popular and growing demand that profiteers be punished with imprisonment as well as fines. You are one of the first to suffer. The President will not interfere."

"Who calls me a profiteer! Who calls—? I gave the hospital. I subscribed more than any Bradford citizen to the Liberty Loans. I—"

Randall's face was purple, his big form rose slowly, he had taken one halting step toward Dr. Ward, when he swayed, threw out one hand to grasp support, and before Dr. Ward could rise from his desk, fell face forward on the floor.

The noise of his fall was heard by Mrs. Ward and Esther. They came running down stairs and into the study just as Dr. Ward was trying to raise Randall up. When the physician came in answer to the instant summons he declared it to be a stroke, and Requa was sent for. Dick came in a few minutes after she arrived. It was a circle of pale faces that looked at one another about the bed where Randall had been laid as they waited for the doctor's verdict.

"He may recover, probably will—only to receive another stroke later. No one can tell when. The wisdom of all the medical authorities cannot say more," was the doctor's final word. "Meanwhile, if he can be kept quietly here—"

"His place is here. Requa—" Mrs. Ward had her arm about the girl, and both were sobbing. Requa was at first terrified, but with unexpected steadiness, in the days that followed, she proved an efficient and cheerful nurse. And on the day her father was able to be removed to his own home he followed her every movement with deep and apparently sincere affection.

THEY were alone that morning, and arrangements had been made to have a car at the house by the middle of the afternoon. Randall could speak with some difficulty and was gradually gaining control of the lower part of his body so that the doctor gave him hope of even walking again.

He called Requa up close and whispered to her, "Ask Dr. Ward to come in. I want—to—see—him—alone."

When Dr. Ward came in, Randall motioned him to come up close to the bed after Requa had gone out. He spoke thickly, but Dr. Ward could understand.

"Does the doctor think I—will—get—well?"

Ward hesitated. But finally he said, "He does not know all the possibilities. He says you may be able to walk again."

"I can feel all right in my legs," Randall spoke with pitiful eagerness. Then with a whimper, "I don't want to die, Dr. Ward."

"You may live a long time," Ward said, and waited for any sign of remorse or repentance. But the only emotion in the stricken life that lay there was fear, and Ward went on.

"I have written to the President, and had his reply."

Randall raised himself up in bed and clutched the bedclothes.

"He will pardon me! He will now, won't he!"

"I have his reply," Ward said gravely. "And he says that he cannot grant a pardon, much as he regrets the refusal. But the interests of the public demand your punishment."

Randall fell back. "I am no more guilty than others! Others—" He spoke so thickly that Dr. Ward could not distinguish his words. He sat by his side praying for a sign of repentance or softening of spirit. Randall gave no intimation of any such feeling, and when he was taken home that afternoon he expressed nothing except a broken word of thanks for the Wards' kindness to him.

Within two weeks' time he was walking feebly about his room in his own house, when a federal official came to convey him to the federal prison.

Requa was overwhelmed.

The official was polite and gentlemanly. But he was acting under orders and showed her his papers.

Requa was alone. She went to the telephone and called up Dr. Ward, who replied that he would come right over, and while the official waited she went into her father's room and told him.

To her surprise he took the news quietly and even insisted on going out at once to see the officer.

He walked haltingly into the room and after looking over the papers simply said:

"I'm ready to go any time. I don't think I shall be an expense to the government very long."

"You can have what time you need to adjust your affairs," said the officer.

Requa was standing by her father, who had taken a seat in front of the officer. She suddenly fell down on her knees by Randall and cried out:

"Oh, father, I am going with you! They will let me live in the town. I shall be allowed to see him, won't I?"

She turned to the officer.

"Certainly you can do that. Very many relatives of—of—inmates are near the prison."

"You hear that, father! I am going to be near you!"

Randall drew his daughter's head to him, and two great tears rolled over his cheeks, while his lips trembled.

THEY were sitting thus, the offical in considerable embarrassment, when Dr. Ward and Dick were ushered in.

They were both amazed to note the calmness with which Randall and Requa had reeeived the summons. After talking over the situation Requa assented to the plan that Dr. Ward proposed, that she come and stay with them until her father had been received into the prison.

Randall expressed himself as ready to go at any time.

"They won't have to keep me long," he said to Dr. Ward. "I'll not be a great expense."

Dr. Ward tried to say the right word. If there had been the slightest hint on Randall's part of willingness to acknowledge his guilt or even any softening of his heart in view of his punishment, Ward could have comforted him.

But the only sign Randall gave that night when he left the house with the officer was his emotion as he parted from Requa.

She had borne the strain of the whole terrible experience with astonishing courage and did not break down until after her father had left the house.

Then she turned to Mrs. Ward, who had come over with Dick to help in any way they could, and Mrs. Ward consoled her like a real mother. Not even Dick could take her place, but that evening when the family had all gathered together, Requa had said to Dick simply,

"Dear, you don't see any other way for me, do you? My place is over there near father. What else could I do?"

"Nothing," said Dick, choking. "I don't understand how you bear it. You are the bravest girl."

"I am doing it for him, and for you," said Requa proudly. "But oh, Dick, after all these years—I—want to be with you—to—go with you anywhere. Dick—anywhere in all the world—"

"Some time, maybe—" was all poor Dick could manage to say.

Young People's Topics for January 12

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Gen. 45 : 1-15.

JOSEPH faced the greatest opportunity in world history for getting even. His ten guilty brothers stood before him, utterly in his power, their consciences burning within them over the memory of their unkindness to the youth who had been their brother. They were greatly troubled. He was greatly moved. But it was love, not anger, which moved him, and he brushed aside their guilt, seeing back of it the will of God in making him the means of their salvation. His prophetic dreams came true, but he did not exult except in the joy of reunion. And who shall say that Joseph did not get "even" in fuller measure than if he had practiced the most studied cruelty upon the conscience-stricken brothers?

The Spirit of God within him made Joseph kind and thoughtful and unable to think or do evil, no matter what the provocation. Most of us find excuses for our unkindnesses. "Did you hear what So-and-So said?" is often the beginning of a scandal. A harsh word often stirs up in us a cynical or cutting retort. Failure to include us in a company or plan sometimes appears to warrant us in exercising a more intimate selection of those we bid to our next "good time." Oh, yes, we have an excuse for our unkindnesses, but we have a better reason for kindness, for Christ said: "Return good for evil," and he has promised his Spirit to aid us.

Suppose next time we halt the angry word until we have prayed, "Jesus, help me to be kind," or hold back the denunciation trembling on our tongue while we plead, "Jesus, help me to be just." Suppose we seek opportunities to spend ourselves unselfishly. Suppose we carry the washerwoman's heavy basket, solve the little brother's tough problem, or lift a portion of the household burden from a tired mother's shoulders. Suppose we hunt for souls blinded by despair, borne down by failure, crushed by adversity, and let Christ's love shine through our every speech and act as we hold out a strong young hand to help. It will not be long until we wonder how we could ever have been hasty of speech, unkind, or uncharitable of thought.

Our Purpose and Program As Epworthians

Epworth League Topic. Heb. 10 : 24, 25; James 5 : 16; I Tim. 6 : 18, 19; II Tim. 2 : 15.

THE purpose of the Epworth League, as of the Christian Endeavor and every other branch of the young people's movement, was and still is to promote godliness through the exercise of Christian experience, and to train young Christians for fruitful service. It was to be a salvage corps to prevent young converts from meeting shipwreck through lack of knowledge of the Christian way, or lack of fellowship in faith. It was to be a training-school, a prayer band, an experience exchange, a young people's forum. With the Sunday school as an active partner, the Epworth League for thirty years has been steadily building up the church, furnishing leadership at home and abroad, supplying ministers and college students and missionaries, and supporting the home church and the missions with heart and purse.

The class meeting had passed the zenith of its power; it was not sufficiently democratic, it was too rigid and unchanging. The Epworth League, taking the best elements of the class meeting, changing the organization to a form better suited to young life, has done for the Church in the past generation what the class meeting did in those preceding 1889, but has done it better.

The program for the future contemplates the intensive and extensive development of every phase of Epworthian activity. The Centenary program has a particularly special place for the League. The return of the young men from the army will bring new energy and a new inspiration. The League will begin its second generation with a great forward sweep to new victory. What these goals are, and what the plans and programs outlined, may be learned by addressing the General Secretary, 740 Rush Street, Chicago, Ill.

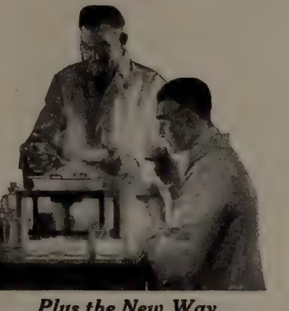
Soups Made by Scientists

Will win any woman who tastes them

The Old Way

Certain chefs made exquisite soups in the old way. Paris was headquarters for these soups, and some of the finest were served there at Hotel Ritz.

A famous chef from the Hotel Ritz brought us these famous recipes. And in our kitchens he made the basic Van Camp Soups.



Plus the New Way

Here culinary experts, college trained, brought these soups to perfection. They applied the new-day methods of scientific cookery. They tested countless blends to reach in each soup the pinnacle of flavor.

They fixed standards for materials. For each they fixed the time of cooking and degree of heat.

Step by step they gave these soups a multiplied delight. They recorded every detail in a most exacting formula.

Thus they evolved the finest soups that science could produce. By analyses and other tests they insured supreme ingredients. And by minute directions they made sure that no Van Camp Soup could vary from the model.

Now All Homes Can Enjoy Them

The result is 18 kinds of soup, each absolutely perfect. Each a better soup of its kind than Paris ever served.

They are served on the finest tables, because no unscientific soup is comparable with Van Camp's.

They are served on modest tables, too, because they cost so little.

Try two or three kinds. Learn how good soups can be. Compare them, for your own sake, with the ordinary ready soups.

A New Year's Budget of Good Things

CONSTITUENTS face the New Year in good heart. Every mail brings us grateful proofs of this. The letters we have the prideful pleasure of sharing with readers today are exceptionally excellent, even for our corresponding members. There is a livelier spirit of good fellowship and desire to increase the Corner treasury of trustworthy recipes, which reflect credit upon them and upon human nature in general.

I give them as they came to me:

"Even though the necessity for saving sugar is not now so urgent, perhaps recipes we have successfully tried may be helpful to some one—and the salad dressing is delicious!

"The cinnamon apples may give a touch of color to the family dinner. They are not only attractive in appearance, but good."

White Layer Cake

"One and three-quarter cups sugar, or two cups sweetened condensed milk; two-thirds cup better, or substitute; two level teaspoons baking-powder; three cups flour; five egg-whites; one teaspoon vanilla; one teaspoon orange juice.

"Cream butter light, then beat in gradually condensed milk, using during the beating just enough flour to prevent separation. Whip yolks creamy and beat into the butter mixture. Next, alternate with flour and milk until all are used. Then baking-powder and fold in beaten whites. Bake slowly at first, increasing heat after cake has risen. Bake about fifty minutes. Put together with any desired filling, custard, jam or jelly."

"Hurry Up" Salad Dressing

"One level teaspoon black pepper; two teaspoons salt (very scant); two tablespoons lemon juice; six tablespoons salad oil.

"Stir together and break into the mixture one egg, using both yolk and white. Shake rapidly in a small glass jar until well mixed. Use for grapefruit, tomato or lettuce salad."

Cinnamon Apples

"Peel and core six firm eating or good cooking apples. Make syrup by dissolving in enough water to cover apples, the little red cinnamon drops bought at any candy shop (I usually use ten cents' worth), and sugar. Quantity of sugar depends upon acidity of fruit. Boil apples until tender but not broken. Remove from syrup, and let this boil until quite thick. Then pour over the apples. They may be served with or without cream as taste dictates. The apples should be very cold."—A. H. B. (Tennessee).

OTHER recipes as tempting as those we give will appear later. A personal comment upon one of the above may not be amiss. Having made trial of recipe for cinnamon apples when it was not convenient to procure at once the candies referred to, we substituted a generous pinch of cinnamon tied in a thin muslin bag and cooked in the syrup. The result was most satisfactory.

Our next contribution has to do with an earlier and more homely course of the family dinner. It is in reply to a request sent in some weeks ago:

Potato Soup

"Mrs. J. H. G. asks for a recipe for potato soup. I herewith enclose one which I have used for years with entire satisfaction:

"One large potato; one onion; one-half cup of flour; rounded tablespoon of fat; one pint milk; one egg; one teaspoonful salt; one-half teaspoonful black pepper.

"Pare and slice thin the potato and onion and put on to boil in a quart of cold water with a teaspoonful of salt and one-half teaspoonful of black pepper. In a thick iron frying-pan (to keep the flour from burning) put a rounded tablespoonful of fat and a small half-cupful of flour. Set over a moderate fire and stir constantly from the bottom with cake-turner (or something with straight end) until the flour is a medium even brown. Don't leave the flour for an instant, as much of the flavor of the soup depends on this process. When the potato and onion are cooked soft, wet the flour in part of the milk and add gradually to the potato, then the rest of the milk, and when it has boiled up, the beaten egg, and it is ready to serve. Of course if it is not salt enough season to taste.

"As it takes a little time to watch the flour browning, to economize time I usually brown enough at once for several days. It is just as nice kept in a covered dish in a cool place for several weeks."—Mrs. D. W. M. (Pennsylvania).

YOU are not the only housewife who makes it a rule to keep browned flour on hand, ready for use in one way or another. A glass jar with a close top may be reserved for this purpose. It is as easy to brown a cupful as a tablespoonful, and a manifest saving of time and care. Let it get perfectly cold before putting it into the jar, but see to it that it is perfectly dry as well. It is valuable for thickening gravies and several other uses which occur in the preparation of savory foods.

We are dull students if we have not learned economy of minutes along with conservation of foodstuffs. She is a wise worker who dovetails one duty into another, and contrives to lessen drudgery by bringing brain power to bear upon the occasion. For instance, when you have to boil milk or custard, or to heat broth, do it in a double boiler, improvising one (if you have no "farina kettle" or other patented contrivance) by setting the vessel containing the liquid in one of hot water. You may safely carry on some other branch of culinary industry at the same time, keeping one side of the aforesaid brain alive to the importance of stirring the contents of the inner vessel at stated intervals. It is always bad management to let anything scorch. It is needless waste of time to watch a boiling pot. "Time is money" is an old proverb, and never truer than in this year of our Lord 1919. The slogan may be sounded officially ere long: "Conserve your time as obediently as you have guarded against unpatriotic extravagance with flour and sugar."

And in all housewifely occupation put into practice another time-seasone admonition to "make one hand wa the other."

Emily Brontë—one of the wonderf girls whose genius won the admiration the reading world—was the best hous wife in Yorkshire. One of her biogr phers depicts her as studying with h book propped upon the shelf above t tray in which she kneaded bread.

"You forget my sedan chair!" sai Madame de Staël, when an admir wondered when she found time for lite ary work amid the crowding duties social and court life. "I compose withi it, on my way to keep my variou engagements."

Be on the lookout for gaps in the day program, and fill up what one shrew time-conserver calls "the betweenities.

How to Cook Rice

"I have seen many ways for cookin rice, but none like our favorite way.

"To one cup of rice add one quart hot water and boil fast until the rice nearly dry; then add one cup of mil or more if needed, and one tablespoonf of sugar, and salt to taste. Do not coo dry, only until the grains begin to brea up, and you will find it excellent."

A Cheap But Good Cake

"Two-thirds of a cup of sugar; one half cup cane syrup; one-half cupful o lard; three-fourths of a cup of milk; tw cups flour; one-half teaspoonful eac of cloves and ginger; one tablespoonfu baking-powder; white of one egg.

"Cream sugar, syrup and lard; ad milk, flour, spices and baking-powde and the beaten white-of-egg last. Raisin may be added if desired."—E. B. P (Ohio).

YOUR way of cooking rice—a cerea that has leaped into favor of lat years—is certainly novel. I take it yo design to make it a dessert and not vegetable to accompany meat. Else why introduce sugar?

Your cake formula seems to merit th caption, "Cheap but good." Especiall if some good substitute for butter b used instead of lard in shortening it.

Moses the Leader of Israel

International Sunday School Lesson for January 12
Ex. 3 : 1 to 4 : 17

Champions of the Oppressed

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

IN A new and fascinating way, the International Lesson Committee has laid out our course on the beginnings of Hebrew history. First we saw Israel in bondage, now we study the character of their great leader, next we shall study the manner of their deliverance from Egypt. In applying these lessons to present-day life we first studied present conditions that are oppressive and detrimental to God's children, and so now we look around for modern deliverers. For we believe that God still has his chosen champions who as in days of old respond to his call to redeem his people.

The God Who Cares and Comes and Sends

Thus we begin where salvation always begins,—in the heart of God the Father. Away back here at the dawn of history we find that the Bible portrays the Almighty as the God who cares, and who comes, and who sends. "I have surely seen the afflictions of my people"—yes, even when it seemed as though he surely did not see, when men fainted for fear. He has surely seen all the awful suffering of his peoples in many lands during the past four years. "And have heard their cry." What cries of anguish have been wrung from the mothers of Belgium, from the poor Armenians, from the wounded and gassed and imprisoned! "I know their sorrows"—this more than mere seeing and hearing. God has suffered with them, experiencing their pain and grief. He has not been standing impassively by. He knows! "And I am come down to deliver them." So he has, so he has! The liberated nations unite to give God the glory. Once more he has made bare his holy arm in the sight of all the earth. "And I will send thee. . . . Certainly I will be with thee." Today he is speaking to his Church, calling still for helpers, for apostolic spirits, to go in his name to win by his grace the greater victories he plans for the future. In the same way that he sent Moses to free the Israelites from the Pharaohs, so he has sent our men to loose the captive little nations in our time. Now the same God sees the evils that remain, he sees the afflictions of peace as well as of war, he heeds the bitter cry of the toilers. He knows the poverty and ignorance and disease of Oriental millions. He is down here to deliver. He stills cares and comes, and verily he still sends. You who have read Dr. Sheldon's story "All the World" have felt the power moving in the Church of today. If any hear and heed God will go with them, as he went with Moses.

Steps in Moses' Preparation

We see in the selection of Moses the choice of a prepared man for a task worth while. The certainty which he achieved on Horeb could not have been his at the beginning of his career. He had learned many a hard lesson. We know but little of the long training of intellect and body in the palaces of Egypt, but it is manifest that Moses profited by the best schooling of his time. We catch a glimpse of the training of his sympathy and compassion in his seeing the afflictions of his people and choosing deliberately to be known as one of the enslaved race, instead of a scion of royalty. We know the vivid story of his experience in finding mere brutal violence and retaliation the wrong way to go about freeing men. It is hard to realize that the meek and patient leader was the violent youth who "looked this way and that," and killed the Egyptian overseer. It makes us realize the possibilities God sees in riotous and rebellious labor leaders all around us today, who need discipline and enlightenment and above all a vision of God in addition to their burning zeal to "do something." What a discipline Moses got—forty years of waiting, praying, planning in the wilderness! How strange it is that prophets and reformers have found their noblest inspiration in the secret places and not in the midst of the crowded market!

Finally there came to this prepared and self-controlled soul a burning revelation of God's purpose to use him as a champion of liberty for the oppressed.

The Long Way or the Short Way

Christian reform must ever be patient and constructive. The worldly revolt is always impatient and destructive. The Christian expects to toil and to pray and to hope long ere the Kingdom comes in full measure in human affairs. His consolation is that it has come to his own heart already and he can well afford to wait. There is a type to which the catchword Bolsheviki has in our day come to be applied, who would better the world by smashing things generally. In our own land the I. W. W. and others call for this sort of thing in the realm of industry, naming their method "direct action." What really saves the situation is the sane and patient leader who rebuilds the railroad without stopping traffic.

So Moses found he had to work with his Hebrew brethren. They were not delivered in the first burst of his youthful anger. After waiting years he found the long way out. Passing the Red Sea meant only the beginning of years of added effort before they were fitted to even enter the Promised Land. Thus we must work now. Our missionaries know it well. Quietly, persistently, they are filling the heathen world with new ideals which in the end shall uplift, have already uplifted, vast masses of men. The deliverer always finds the oppressed slow to respond, whether ancient Hebrews or modern immigrant toilers, or Hindus in the Far East of the world.

So the call rings out for leaders for Christ and his Kingdom. What a chance young America has to answer! We look upon our young people with new and kindling eyes. America's churches and schools must fire the imagination of the young. We must urge and direct them toward securing like Moses the great background of education and training. I saw the other day sixty girls listening to a young woman sound the call to Christian service as a life-work. What eager and glowing faces were transfigured as they caught her spirit! But whether in foreign field or home, Gospel teaching or taking Christ into the world's workshops, they must be told that they have to prepare before they serve, by developing personality full-orbed. God provided a way for Moses to be separated from his people for a season, that he might read and write, attend the Egyptian colleges, and learn of the wise men and philospohers what they had to give. He is opening the way for our boys and girls, too. How crowded the colleges and training-schools ought to be! Yes, he has provided all sorts of privileges, all kinds of specialized preparation. If we avail ourselves of these he gives us more, better, the new vision, the personal revelation of his will for us.

Let us help our classes to see how well prepared the leaders of old were, and in what diverse ways. Show them too the modern champions of the Kingdom, statesmen who built to endure like Washington and Lincoln, and their arduous training for leadership. Tell of William Carey's scholarship and of Alexander Mackay's all-round handicrafts. Point to Arthur Henderson, England's great Christian labor leader, as the type of man whom God is using to bring splendid things to pass. Such men as these are Moses' successors, and they can truly claim God's promise to Joshua, "As I was with Moses, so will I be with thee; I will not fail thee or forsake thee." If we heed Christ's call, this assurance is ours also.

Do They Make Fun of Your Boy—or Girl?

Is your child subjected to the jokes of his classmates when he talks? Does he suffer from the laughter at his attempts to recite his lessons? If he stammers or stutters he must be cured to have the same chance for success as his friends. Unless his condition is corrected he will be handicapped for life.

He can be freed from this handicap by spending a few weeks at Bogue Institute, established 1901. There he will be permanently cured of stammering, as have hundreds of others through the sane, scientific methods of Benjamin N. Bogue. The principles of instruction were evolved by Mr. Bogue who cured himself after stammering for twenty years. Best of home care and comforts in dormitories. Endorsed by physicians. No drugs used. Mr. Bogue's book, "Stammering—Its Cause and Its Cure," which gives full details of the Institute and its work will be sent on request. Address

Vapo Cresolene

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs.

Established 1879

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs.

Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold.

Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp."

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights.

It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers.

For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities.

It is a protection to those exposed.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 39 years of successful use.

Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet.

A Sheaf of Poems

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Worth-While Wealth

I LONGED for wealth—to hold it;
I longed for might and fame;
My youth? I shrugged, and sold it,
To triumph in life's game.
I toiled and toiled, unceasing,
To win my place, but when I gained the thing I toiled for,
I did not want it then!

For then I found life's flowers
All faded by my door;
I found the springtime showers
Less cooling than before;
I found the very sunshine
Had lost it's gleaming light,
And that the stars were pallid
That lit the world at night.

I longed for wealth, to hold it;
I longed for might and fame;
But—when I could enfold it,
I found it just a name!
And that the things worth saving
Were youth, and smiles, and flowers;
And that the wealth enduring
Was found in golden hours.

The Letter

A LITTLE letter came to me today,
A little letter thrilling with romance;
A letter from a dear one far away,
A little letter bravely postmarked "France."
It told of health and strength and hope, despite
The battles that were ever raging near;
It told of faith renewed to fight the fight;
It breathed across the seas a world of cheer!

And so, when Sonny-boy, his curls agleam,
Came, eyes athirst for knowledge, to my knee,
His tiny question somehow did not seem
As strange as questions often do to me.
For, oh, he said, "Where does th' postman get
Th' letters that he carries on his back?
've often wondered, but I never yet
Have foun' out jus' who puts 'em in his sack!"

And with my letter pressed against my heart,
And with a hope new-springing in my soul,
And with the knowledge that, though miles apart,
True love may keep serene and pure and whole—answered, drawing Sonny very near,
And brushing, as I did, my tears away,
I think perhaps it came from God, my dear,
The letter that the postman brought today!"

Colors

LOVE color.
I love flaming reds,
nd vivid greens,
nd royal flaunting purples.
love the startled rose of the sun at dawning, nd the blazing orange of it at twilight.

love the drowsy blue of the fringed gentian, nd the yellow of the goldenrod, nd the rich russet of the leaves hat turn at autumn-time. . . .
love rainbows,
nd prisms,
nd the tinsel glitter
f every shop-window.

love color.
nd yet, today,
saw a brown little bird erched on the dull-gray fence
f a weed-filled city yard.
nd as I watched him
he little bird
hrew back his head efiantly, almost,
nd sang a song
That was full of gay ripples,
And poignant sweetness,
And half-hidden melody.

I love color. . . .
I love crimson, and azure,
And the glowing purity of white.
And yet, today,
I saw a living bit of brown,
A vague oasis on a streak of gray,
That brought heaven
Very near to me.

At Dawn

THE dawn is here! I climb the hill;
The earth is young and strangely still;
A tender green is showing where
But yesterday my fields were bare . . .
I climb and, as I climb, I sing;
The dawn is here, and with it—spring!

My oxen stamp the ground, and they Seem glad, with me, that soon the day
Will bring new work for us to do!
The light above is clear and blue;
And one great cloud that swirls on high,
Seems sent from earth to kiss the sky.

The birds are coming back again,
They know that soon the golden grain
Will wave above this fragrant loam;
The birds, with singing, hasten home;
And I, who watch them, feel their song
Deep in my soul, and nothing wrong,
Or mean, or small, can touch my heart. . . .
Down in the vale the smoke-wreaths start,
To softly curl above the trees;
The fingers of a vagrant breeze
Steal tenderly across my hair,
And toil is fled, and want, and care!

The dawn is here!
I climb the hill;
My very oxen seem to thrill—
To feel the mystery of day.
The sun creeps out, and far away
From man-made laws I worship God,
Who made the light, the cloud, the sod;
I worship smilingly, and sing!

The dawn is here, and with it—spring!

There Are Such Weary Little Lines

THERE are such weary little lines about the mouth of you,
Such tragic little mirthless lines—they mock at dreams come true,
And twist your lips when you would smile, until all mirth is dead,
And I, who want to laugh with you, am fain to weep instead!

There are such dreary little lines about the mouth of you,
They make me want to whisper that the summer sky is blue,
And that the rain is like a lance of silver through the air,
And that the flowers in the lane are growing tall and fair!

There are such tired little lines about the mouth of you—
As if you thought that life was cold and loving friends were few. . . .
They are such lonely little lines I think that I, some day,
Will creep close to you in the dusk, and kiss them quite away!

John Goode and His Message

I WANT to tell you how much good your Brother John Goode did us all. I do not know how many have spoken of his wonderful message. We had one young man ask for prayer at the close of his address. Every one in the room was very deeply moved by his message, which was just what I believe we need in many of our churches, where so many have lost the faith in the old Gospel of Divine Power. This is the Gospel I believe and preach constantly. C. L. CORLIN, Pastor, 1st M. E. Church.

Your Tooth Brush
Can be Ten-Fold More Effective

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

You Omit the Film

Ordinary brushing, as millions know, fails to save the teeth.

Teeth still discolor, still decay. Tartar forms and pyorrhea starts. From time to time, accumulations must be removed by a dentist.

The trouble lies in a clinging film which is constantly formed on the teeth. That is the cause of most tooth troubles. And that is what you largely fail to reach.

This film is what discolors, not your teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So that film is the teeth's great enemy—the one which you must combat.

Dental science had for years sought a way to fight it. Now that way is found. Clinical tests have proved this beyond question.

It is now embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent, and we urge you to see what it does.

Try This Way Once

That film is albuminous, so we now apply pepsin to it—the digestant of albumin. The object is to dissolve the film, in crevices and elsewhere. Then to constantly prevent its accumulation.

Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth.

A harmless method has been found to activate the pepsin. Five governments have already granted patents. That method is employed in Pepsodent alone. And many tests have proved its efficiency on film. It is endorsed by many able authorities.

You can quickly see that Pepsodent does what nothing else has done. One week will give you a new idea of what teeth cleaning means.

Send the coupon for a One-Week Tube. Use it like any tooth paste and watch the results. Note how clean your teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the slimy film. See how teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

Do this for your teeth's sake. Compare the results with the old ways. You can judge for yourself. After that week you will never return to old methods, we believe. Cut out the coupon now.

10 WONDERFUL VIEWS OF THE HOLY LAND

HERE is a great opportunity for you to secure ten beautiful reproductions in full color of the most famous and accurate Holy Land paintings that have ever been made. These works of a great artist have preserved to the world the Holy Land of Bible days, that country known and loved so well by our Saviour.

In the past you have known the Holy Land only through the most meager and uninspired dressings, none of them presenting this wonderful country in its true beauty and charm. Now you are offered masterpieces that put before your eyes the entire birthplace of Christianity as Christ himself knew it. For the first time ten of these views in all the beautiful tints and shades of the land itself are offered you.

Like a Visit to Palestine

As you look at these pictures you feel that you yourself stand with the artist on the slope of Olivet and look across the valley of Jehoshaphat, through which winds the old road to Samaria, and beyond, under the bright sunshine, you see the walls of Jerusalem. Through these works of art you travel the Jordan road as did our Saviour so many years ago. You visit the Pool of Bethesda, and the tomb of St. James, and feel the charm, the beauty, and the dignity of every sacred place. These reproductions are in themselves a trip to the Holy Land.

David Roberts, of the Royal Academy, made the long trip from England for the purpose of painting the most famous scenes of biblical history in order that the Christian world might have truthful pictures of the birthplace of the religion. He expressed in water-colors the scenes of Christ's life and activities, as well as many things of historical interest in Egypt and the Nile country, the very cradle of modern civilization, which he visited while on his way to Palestine. Reproductions of ten of Mr. Roberts' great paintings have been made and are now offered you in folio form. The booklet is 4½x9½ inches. Every picture is worthy of framing.

With each of the ten pictures goes a complete description of the scene depicted with mention of the historical and biblical interest that attaches to the place. Every student of the Bible and every person interested in the life and progress of these early days will appreciate the beauty and value of these reproductions, both as works of art and as illustrations of the great scenes in scriptural history.

THREE SPECIAL OFFERS

These special offers are strictly limited to the supply of Holy Land Booklets which we have completed for distribution. These color reproductions are really so beautiful you will want at least a dozen after you see one.

Kept by Prayer in the Battle

A Marine's Letter Tells of the Fighting Before the War Closed

YOU may be surprised to learn that I am in Paris. You are not more surprised than I was to get here. I am in the hospital. Don't let this worry you though, because I am just about well now. The last front I was on was the Champagne; we were in for nine days and ten nights, and the weather is a little cold now to sleep in trenches and holes. The consequence was I got the first attack of asthma I have had since I have been in the service. It was not a severe attack, and I was so well taken care of that this experience in the hospital has been a great pleasure.

After we (the marines) went through the St. Mihiel drive, we were out of the lines for a few days when we started for the Champagne front. We understood we were to be Gen. Petain's reserves. But when we got on the line, were told we were to take Mont Blanc Ridge. This position was the key to the whole situation. You read about the battle, you know that a few days after the drive started that the "squareheads" retreated six miles voluntarily because we held the key to the situation. This was the Hindenburg line and the position that old Hindenburg boasted the Allies would never occupy again.

I went over the top with the first wave. We had hard going and lost heavily. In many respects this drive was as bad as Château-Thierry, and many of the boys thought it was worse. You may think that I am not in the hottest places because I have not been wounded. But I have, and I could relate to you many a hair-raising incident where it was nothing short of a miracle that saved me. It seems as though I have a charmed life—but I know the fact. It is God's guidance, his answer to your prayers, dear Mother, and the prayers of every one at home. The power of prayer is wonderful.

We won our objective (talking about this last front) after a couple of hours. I was on the extreme left flank with my gun. We failed to connect with the French, that left a gap and trouble. We came to a large dugout, threw a hand grenade and out came about 300 "squareheads." We were forming them to take to the rear when a machine-gun opened up on us about 55 yards away. The men dropped like flies; they wounded seven in our section and killed Corporal Fay, in charge of the other gun. That left one gun and it was mine. We were forced to fall back about 150 yards because we feared a counter attack, and they did attack. My gun was the only one on the line. I just swept the whole line. As soon as old Fritz knew there was a machine-gun on the line, they turned tail and ran, falling all over themselves.

We fought here for two days when we went over the top and captured about 235 more squareheads. After everything was over, we buried all the marines who had fallen nearby. The saddest funeral I ever attended was when four of us carried Corporal Fay to a hole which one of us had been occupying for the past two days, and where we put him to rest, rolled in his own blanket. I took special pains with his grave, because we all loved him. I planted an evergreen and I carved a cross out of white chalk and we laid his helmet on the grave, with a branch of evergreen. It was a pretty grave after we were finished with it. It was striking to see some of the old boys (old-time marines) stand there choking with a lump in their throat. We don't often have burial scenes. We always left it for the burial squads. I hope I don't have to bury any more.

The Germans say they were forced to fight, but what strikes me as odd is that we buried eight or ten marines who were shot through the head by snipers right around my position, and if the Germans were forced to fight, it appears to me thay put a lot of personal will power and skill into it.

About this dugout is where we got all the prisoners. They were wonders. It was about 40 feet down to the first floor, and then there were two more floors down below. It had five entrances and would remind you of a hotel, with long corridors and rooms opening on both sides. There were also electric lights throughout and a large telephone exchange, in the lobby as it were. They claim that Russian prisoners did all the work. The "squareheads" believe in comfort.

Corporal C. A. Nordberg,
U. S. Marines.

To Send Missionaries to Russia

EVER since the Russian Revolution we have been following the developments with a growing anxiety. We have been made once more to feel the tremendous truth of the words of Jesus, "Whosoever committeth sin is a slave of sin. If the Son, therefore, shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." How deceived have millions of people become, hoping and trusting for real freedom, to find they have been beating the wind.

We are led to conclude, from all we hear and know, that Russia has never in all her history experienced anything like the present tragedy. Indeed, it seems the time has come when father has risen up against son and son against father, and when the enemies of a man are those of his own household. If ever American Christians prayed for Russia and the perishing Russian people, they should pray now. We ask individual Christians to pray in their churches and in their homes before God on behalf of the 182,000,000 suffering Russians.

A Russian paper just received tells just a little bit of the story of Russia's trouble. A correspondent who has been in Russia and has just returned informs us that the present terror supersedes all the terrible things of the French Revolution. The number of slain officers in Moscow during one month has been greater than the total number of aristocrats who perished during the terror of the Jacobins. Capital punishment by shooting has taken place openly in the street. The dead bodies were thrown en masse into the river. In parts of the city, for instance, in the region of the Kunznetsky Bridge, and at a place called the Pure Lakes, the whole atmosphere has been contaminated from these murders. Many sailors are openly boasting that the killing of people has become a habit. At the same time theaters, cafés chantants and underground rooms are filled with the merry-making public. The use of cocaine has spread exceedingly among the younger people. We are led to conclude that home life in Russia has become very cheap. The Russian people have almost forgotten, it seems to us, that God is love, or that such a thing as pure, unselfish love still exists in the world. Their hearts have become harrowed by the awful things happening, until now there is probably not a whole spot left. What would be the result if a number of men and women, filled with the love of God, should go out to these dying and unhappy people and tell them that there is still hope, that there is still One in heaven who sympathizes with them and who sacrificed his own Son to bring man back to life and his Father's house.

We shall need funds to send out the first party of missionaries next summer. We would like if that number could be at least from fifty to one hundred, and we could find even more of our Russian students of the Russian Missionary and Educational Society, Philadelphia, who would be willing to go out and tell of Jesus.

TRUE STORIES OF THE WAR

Real experiences of real people—written to the music of guns. From out of the holocaust of nations, the high, unbreakable spirit of man leaps forth in story after story.

For these 200 stories all the smoking, shrieking battle-fronts of the war have been ransacked. In these volumes, the theories, the practice, the prophecies of war have no place.

Here you will find the story of a man and his courage—a woman and her sacrifice—a courtesan and her treachery—a spy and his intrigue—a little child and his inspiration—and on and on for 200 stories—2000 pages—of life and death.

For most of us duty lies here, far from the places where men live whole lives in a day. But in these volumes is your chance to get away from bread and butter every day and drink the wine of eager life that these men and women pour forth before you.

For in these pages the doers, the fighters, the workers of this war take you by the hand and lead you through trench and hospital, under the sea and through the air to some thrilling story of a human heart and soul. These 200 tales of valor, daring and beauty promise that the human race today is climbing through suffering and despair to new heights.

YOURS FREE You have only to sign the order blank below, if you are prompt, to get the six volumes to examine, without obligation or expense, except a stamp. Do not let this chance go by without seeing what it is.

For besides thrilling you beyond any reading you have had before, 15 minutes spent each day with these stories will soon make your newspaper reading, your magazine reading and your conversation vastly more interesting and profitable.

A good orchard has always been an asset to the owner. It is worth more today and will be still more valuable next year and for many years to come. The price of good fruit is high and is going higher.

Planting of new orchards and upkeep of old orchards has been neglected on account of war-time demands and conditions. There is also a growing appreciation of the health value and food value of fruit.

The biggest profit is in supplying local markets, and the farmer who starts an orchard now and gives it the little care and attention it needs will have an income producer when farm crops have fallen off in price.

If you have only a small piece of ground, you can make it produce a surprising amount of fruit at little expense and trouble. Fresh, ripe fruit from your own garden will be a big help on the grocery bill and a source of great satisfaction. Don't put it off another year.

ahead, staring with a kind of wild frenzy at John Cameron walking alone at the end of the line.

SHE remembered him in her youngest school days, the imp of the school room, with a twinkle in his eye and an irrepressible grin upon his handsome face. Nothing had ever daunted him, and no punishment had ever stopped his mischief. He never studied his lessons, yet he always seemed to know enough to carry him through, and would sometimes burst out with astonishing knowledge where others failed. But there was always that joke on his lips and that wide delightful grin that made him the worshiped afar of all the little girls. He had dropped a rose upon her desk once as he lounged laughing to his seat after recess, apparently unaware that the teacher was calling him to order. She could feel the thrill of her little childish heart now as she realized that he had given it to her. The next term she was sent to a private school and saw no more of him save an occasional glimpse as she passed him on the street, but she had never forgotten him; and now and then she had heard little things about him. He was working his way through college. He was on the football team and the baseball team. She knew vaguely that his father was dead and they had lost their money, but beyond that she knew nothing of him. He was not of her world, and gossip about him seldom came her way. But the memory of that rose had never quite faded from her heart even though she had been but seven. Now, suddenly she saw him in another light. The laugh was gone from his lips and the twinkle from his eyes. He looked as he had looked the day he fought Chuck Woodcock for tying a string across the sidewalk and tripping up the girls on the way to school. It came to her like a revelation that he was going forth in just such way, to fight the world-foe. In a way he was going to fight for her! To make the world a safe place for girls such as she!

All the rest of the straggling line of draft men were going out for the same purpose perhaps, but it had not occurred to her that they were anything to her, until she saw John Cameron. All those friends of her own world who were training for officers, too, were going to fight in the same way to defend the world, but she had not thought of it before. It took a sight of John Cameron's high bearing and serious face to bring the sudden knowledge to her.

She thought no longer of trying to get away. She forgot that she was staying, forgot that she was staring.

The gates presently were lifted silently to let the little procession pass to the other side of the tracks, and within a few short minutes the special train that was to take them away to camp came rattling up, bearing other men who were to be pioneers in the camps of the National Army. These were a noisy, jolly bunch. Perhaps having had their own sad partings they were only trying now to brace themselves against the scenes through which they must pass, that must remind them of their own weeping sisters and mothers and sweethearts. Something of this Ruth Macdonald seemed to divine, as, startled and annoyed by the clamor in the midst of the sacredness of the moment, she turned to look at the crowding heads in the car windows and caught the eye of an irrepressible youth. "Think of me over there!" he shouted, waving a flippant hand, and twinkling at the beautiful girl in her car.

Another time Ruth would have resented such familiarity, but now something touched her spirit with an inexpressible pity, and she let a tiny ripple of a smile pass over her lovely face as her eyes traveled on down the platform to search for the tall form of John Cameron. In the moment of watching the train she had somehow missed which way he went. Ah! There he was, stooping over a little white-haired woman, taking her tenderly in his arms for a moment to kiss her. The girl's eyes lingered on him. His whole attitude was such a revelation of the man the rollicking boy had become.

THEN the whistle sounded, the dra men gave one last wringing h clasp, one last look, and sprang board.

John Cameron was the last to bo the train. He stood on the lower of the last car as it slowly began to m His hat was lifted, and he stood w slightly raised chin and eyes that loo as if he had sounded the depths of ness and surrendered himself to wh ever had been decreed. There was tled sorrow in all the lines of his face. Ruth was startled by the cha in it: by the look of the boy in the m Had the War done that for him just one short summer? Had it done t for the thousands who were going fight for her? And she was sitting in luxurious car with a bundle of wool her feet, and presuming to bear her p by mere knitting! Poor little usel woman that she was! She shudde as she watched his face with its stro uplifted look and its unutterable s row. Oh, he would be gay tomorro like the rest, with his merry jest a his contagious grin, and his mak light of the serious business of w He would not be the boy he u to be without that. But she wou never forget that in this farewell m ute, while he was looking his last on t life of his boyhood, and being bor away into a dubious future, he h looked like this! She felt a hopel yearning, as if, had there been time, s would have liked to have told him h much she appreciated his doing t great deed, for her and all her sisters!

The train had slipped along ten fe or more and was gaining speed wh John Cameron's eyes met those Ruth Macdonald, and her vivid, spea ing face flashed its message to his so A pleased wonder sprang into his ey a question as his glance lingered, held the tumult in her face, and the unmi takable personality of her glance. Th his face lit up with his old smile, grave oh, much! and more deferential than used to be, and with a certain court ness in it that spoke of more maturity spirit. He lifted his hat a little high and waved it just a trifle in recognitio of her greeting, wondering in sudde confusion if he were really not mistake after all; then amazed at the flutter her handkerchief in reply.

The train was moving rapidly now i the midst of a deep throaty cheer tha sounded more like a sob, and still h stood on that bottom step with his ha lifted and let his eyes linger on th slender girlish figure in the car, with th morning sun glinting across her re gold hair, and that beautiful soft ros in her cheeks.

As the train swept past the little she ter shed he bethought himself an turned a farwell tender smile on th white-haired woman who stood watching him through a mist of tears. The his eyes went back for one last glimps of the girl, and so he flashed out of sigh around the curve.

Y. M. C. A. Answers Critics

VARIOUS rumors regarding profiteering on the part of the Y.M.C.A. and failure on the part of secretaries to risk their lives have come back from France with returning soldiers. The War Work Council of the Y.M.C.A. at a meeting in New York on December 19 took up these criticisms. Following the meeting John R. Mott issued a statement in which he said: "We want to know all of our shortcomings both of omission and commission. We want all the reliable information on this subject we can obtain, and anybody who has any ought to let us have it as soon as possible. They owe it to the men who are still over there and will be over there for many months. If we aren't delivering the goods, after the way the people of this country have supported us, then we ought to be made to do so, and that can be done. We have heard much fault found with what we have done. Some of it is justified.

"It has been said that the Y.M.C.A. has been profiting. The following telegram from Third Assistant Secretary of War F. P. Keppel is self-explanatory:

"'Matter of prices asked by Young Men's Christian Association for its articles sold in canteen overseas already investigated by War Department and condition being remedied.' Young Men's Christian Association originally asked by General Pershing to run canteen for army on cost basis. To do this had to reckon in price fixing such overhead charges as transportation charges and marine insurance, so that prices were much higher than in this country. Young Men's Christian Association made no profit, but lost thousands of dollars. Arrangements now made will enable them to obtain supplies from sources that will reduce overhead charges and keep prices down.

"Again, I have heard it charged that none of the men in the service could get anything for nothing from the Y. M. C. A., except writing paper. It has been the policy of the Y. M. C. A. to give free service and not primarily free supplies. All the privileges of huts are absolutely free. So are the motion picture shows, and the lecture courses.

"I have been asked if it is true that the Y. M. C. A. workers overseas persistently dodged dangers. The best answer to the question, however, is that since the Y. M. C. A. went overseas to serve the American Expeditionary Forces nine of its workers have been killed by shell fire while on duty, twenty-nine were seriously gassed or wounded, and in addition to this thirty-one have died in the service chiefly as a result of exposure and overwork. It will be of interest to add that ten have been cited for bravery or decorated."

Questions and Answers

D. SPENCER HATCH, senior secretary of the Y. M. C. A., attached to the Mesopotamian Expeditionary Force, writes: "It was in the last army camp on a wild road along the Afghanistan frontier in the lower Himalayas. Several score of men from army prison camps had been attached to the force here, and seemed to be 'leavening the whole' with their vices, their swearing, their stealing, their sinning. They were helped in this by the lonesomeness and the monotony of the frontier army life. Three Christian soldiers, a corporal and two privates, walked together one night on the outskirts of the camp, and talked with deepest concern of how vice was spread from lad to lad, throughout the whole camp. Finally they knelt on the far side of the camp, on the only level piece of ground, and prayed that something might happen to turn the tide. They could not ask specifically—they had no plan—no tangible possibility presented itself—they simply prayed, oh, so earnestly, for 'something.' That night, I was on an ocean liner in the Mediterranean Sea heading for the East, I knew not where. My destination had not been decided further than that I was to do Y. M. C. A. work in the army 'somewhere in the East.' That night, as each other night, kneeling there on the upper deck, I looked up to the starry heavens and earnestly pleaded, 'O God, place me among men who need Christ, and use me to lead them to him.' I had never heard of an army camp on the far frontier. Three weeks later I was in charge of the Y. M. C. A., whose large tent had been pitched over the very spot where the three soldiers had prayed. We were in the midst of a revival in which men, night after night, knelt down and gave their hearts and lives to Christ. And the corporal, with the two private soldiers, prayed, 'O Christ, who saw us kneel on this very ground only three weeks ago, we thank thee for answered prayer.'"

G. J., Paris, Mo. "Confess your faults one to another," says James (5 : 16). It makes the whole problem of confession simple to remember that the duty is to confess to those whom we have wronged. If we have done any wrong to any person, we must confess it to him and ask him to forgive us. But things that only God knows about need be confessed only to God. To go over one's whole past life and attempt confession of all one's slights and wrongs would simply create new difficulties. If you are convinced that the wrongs you committed have done no harm, even though they might have, let them rest with God, first asking his forgiveness of any wrong intent.

G. A. S., Macon, Ga. Jacob did wrong in practicing subtility to get from Isaac the blessing which was to come to him. He ought to have been patient and trusted that God in his own way would fulfil the promise. Incidentally, the story condemns his act by showing how he suffered afterward in being an exile from home and becoming himself the victim of deception, first by Laban, who tricked him out of the wife for whom he had served seven years, and afterward by his sons, who deceived him about the fate of Joseph.

Mrs. M. J. S., London, Ont., Canada. The word "profane" in Heb. 12 : 16, as applied to Esau, is used in a similar sense as when we speak of profane history, meaning secular. The writer of the epistle intimates that Esau was not a man of any spirituality, but one who esteemed the good things of life, the things which give physical pleasure, as more valuable than spiritual things. He mentions as illustration, Esau's parting with the privileges belonging to him as the eldest son for a bowl of soup, and draws the lesson that one who cares more for the gratification of his bodily appetite than he does for the development of his spiritual nature is a profane or non-spiritual person, who is unfit for Christ's kingdom.

M. P., New Brunswick, Canada. To understand the passage in Luke 14 : 33 you must compare it with Matt. 19 : 27. You will then see that it is simply the negative form of a proposition as contrasted with the positive, and that both must be considered. The spirit of Jesus was one of love, not of hate. He demanded the supreme love of the heart, and should occasion arise when the claims of kindred or even of life itself were antagonistic to those of Christ, any or all of these claims must be sacrificed for his sake. One who was not prepared to do this was not worthy to be his disciple.

A. M. R., Florida. It does not seem that the mortality in this war is higher than in other wars, and the mortality from disease is certainly much less. Speaking on this line the Hardwood Record of Chicago says that "during the Mexican War in 1847 the death-rate from disease per year was one in ten of the men in the Army; during our Civil War it was one in twenty-five; during the Spanish-American War it was one in forty; and in the Russo-Japanese War the rate of death by disease fell to one in fifty. During the present war the death-rate from disease among American troops has been falling, and the latest report indicates only one in five hundred per year. This applies to soldiers abroad and at home. It is only one-third as high as the death-rate among men of military age in civil life, showing that health is three times as good in the army as out of it."

Teacher, New York. I'm sending you, for the benefit of your readers who have little folks in their house, a song which seems to have caught the hearts of the pupils in New York's public schools. We hear it sung everywhere, and my thought in sending it was that it might help the War Work cause in village and rural schools, for we shall have to do lots more for our boys at the front before they come back to their homes again. These are the lines of the little song:

"Pack up your dollars in a money bag,
And smile, smile, smile!
Send it across and never let it lag—
Giving's all the style.
What's the use of hoarding it?
It never was worth while.
So send your savings to our soldier lads,

HIS hammer falls with rhythmic, Titan grace,
While beads of moisture stand upon his face;
Beneath the sun he toils, and never dreams
That he may be a savior of his race.

He only knows the rivets that he drives
Must be well placed and firm—and so he strives
To do the best he can. And yet his work
It is that safeguards many precious lives.

He does not dream, perhaps, and yet we know
The distance that his well-built ships will go—
We know the tempests of the angry sea,
The high-flung waves, the stormy winds that blow!

He only knows he has a task, and he Must do it! So he flings across the sea
A bridge of ships to meet his Nation's need,
A bridge that leads to Peace and Liberty.

Judge Aston, Chairman of the Decalogue Committee of Wellington, New Zealand, writes: "In nearly every part of the British Empire provision is made in the official syllabus issued by the various educational departments for the children to learn in school hours the Ten Commandments. It is claimed that a knowledge of these laws is in the interests of character-building and good citizenship, and also an aid to good government. Their truths are so self-evident that they require no explanation or comment." He then proceeds to show that in many of the British public schools the Decalogue is now taught to and repeated by the pupils, also in Canada, South Africa, Australia and Jamaica, W. I., the same custom is now observed in many schools.

W. F. W. Chattanooga, Tenn. In regard to your suggestion that women do not want to vote, we are informed by the Equal Suffrage Committee that women's associations with a membership aggregating 11,000,000 have endorsed suffrage, and that in the State of New York 1,000,000 women registered lately; 600,000 in New York City, or nine-tenths of the eligible women.

E. D. R., Haddonfield, N. J. Colonel Theodore Roosevelt was awarded the Nobel Prize because it was largely through his offices and personal intercession that the peace ending the Russo-Japanese War was concluded at Portsmouth, N. H., between the envoys of the warring nations in 1905.

Mrs. H. A. K., Franklin, N. Y. An old pieced quilt, if in good condition, should be easily disposed of through one of the exchanges for women's work, or through a dealer in antiques. A branch of the Woman's Exchange is at 577 Madison Avenue, New York City.

Mrs. M. F., Loyal, Wis. The word "doughboy" was derived originally from a form of small cake that was issued to the sailors. Later it was applied to a button of similar shape worn by infantrymen, and finally to the soldiers themselves.

W. H. F., Hope, Bartholomew County, Indiana, writes: After reading the interesting article, "The Ever-Full Sugar Bowl, in the November 6 issue of the Christian Herald, I would like to have you pass on to L. Lodian, the author, the information that another American product, the banana, has great possibilities for sugar production. While spending some four years in Nicaragua, about 125 miles north of Bluefields, I constantly had on hand several thousand pounds of banana sugar made somewhere in the interior, and which I purchased from the big trading houses in Bluefields. It was like soft brown cane sugar, out of which there ran a good deal of syrup, especially when the bags were piled up, one on top of another, the top one often drying out fairly white. The sugar I used in trading with the Indians at the Moravian Mission Station of Wounta Haulover. If the world ever produces more bananas than it can eat raw, they need never go to waste if capital can be interested in the sugar industry."

Reader, Brooklyn, N. Y. The denominations do not differ so radically as you appear to imagine. If you were to ask a Baptist, a Methodist, a Presbyterian, a Congregationalist, or a Disciple, the way to be saved, and how a Christian ought to live in the world, you would get practically identical answers from them all. They and other denominations agree in the essentials. On questions of church government and of rites and observances there is still some divergence, due largely to the different cast of mind and to association and environment; but even these are fast disappearing and will, we hope, soon be a thing of the past. The Lutherans have made a great step forward lately in unity. We believe the time is ripe for getting together to adopt a course for attaining a common end—the evangelization of all the world.

Mrs. F. B., Iola, Kan. In reply to your letter, asking how you might locate your relative who had been listed in some shipyard, the United States Shipping Board suggests that you communicate with its Staff Specialist of Personnel, Mr. George L. Tirrell, Emergency Fleet Corporation, 140 North Broad Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

C. H., Paterson, N. J. This department does not vouch for the reliability of any firm or corporation; therefore we are unable to advise you regarding the company about which you have written to us.

E. B. H., Ocean Grove, N. J. The correct pronunciation of Versailles is Ver"sai'ye, and of Valenciennes is Va"lan"syen.'

M. O., Pittsburg, Pa. I have heard from a friend of an ancient Turkish tradition which declared that when Damascus was lost to the Turks it was a sign that the end of the Moslem power was at hand. Can you inform me where I can find any record of such a prediction? It seems to be known to Arabic scholars. A recent letter from Dr. M. M. Housepian appeared in the New York Times, in which the writer refers to an ancient Turkish prophetic saying—handed down from generation to generation, but its origin is unknown—which, freely translated, means: "Damascus is the beginning of the end," or, more literally, "First, Sham; last, Sham." The word "Sham" is the Turkish name for Damascus.

160 HENS— 1500 EGGS

AS AMERICA'S foremost poultry expert I predict that eggs are going to retail for a dollar a dozen this winter. Right now the retail price is from 50c to 75c per dozen in some of the large cities. At a dollar a dozen poultry raisers are going to make tremendous egg profits. You, too, can make sure of a big egg yield by feeding your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs" tonic. This product has been tried, tested and proven. It is acknowledged the best and most successful egg producer on the market today. Every day that you don't use it means that you are losing money. Don't delay. Start with a few cents' worth of "More Eggs" tonic now.

Got 117 Eggs Instead of 3

That's the experience of one poultry raiser who wrote me. A. P. Woodard of St. Cloud, Fla., writes: "I get from 40 to 50 eggs a day now. Before using 'More Eggs' I was getting only 8 or 9 eggs a day." Here are the experiences of a few others of the hundreds who write me:

"160 Hens—125 Dozen Eggs"

E. J. Reefer: Waverly, Mo.
I have fed two boxes of More Eggs Tonic to my hens and I think my hens have broken the record for eggs. I have 160 White Leghorns and from March 25 to April 15 I sold 125 dozen eggs. MRS. H. M. PATTON.

"15 Hens—310 Eggs"

E. J. Reefer: Turner Falls, Mass.
I used your More Egg Tonic and from December 1 to February 1, from 15 hens, I got 310 eggs. Your remedies are just what you claim them to be MRS. C. R. STOUGHTON.

"More Than Doubled In Eggs"

E. J. Reefer: Mendon, Ill.
I am very much pleased with your "More Eggs" Tonic. My hens have more than doubled up in their eggs. L. D. NICHOLS.

126 Eggs In 5 Days

E. J. Reefer: Salina, Okla.
I wouldn't try to raise chickens without "More Eggs," which means more money. I use it right along. I have 33 hens and in 5 days have gotten 10½ dozen eggs or 126. MRS. J. O. OAKES.

"48 Dozen in One Week"

Dear Mr. Reefer: Woodbury, Tenn.
I can't express how much I have been benefited by answering your ads. I've got more eggs than I ever did. I've sold 42 ½ dozen eggs last week, set 4 dozen, ate some and had 1 ½ dozen left.
From your friend, MRS. LENA McBROON.

"Selling Eggs Now"

E. J. Reefer: Hebo, Oregon
I was not getting an egg when I began the use of the "More Eggs" Tonic. Now I am selling eggs MRS. J. F. BRINK.

"Gets Winter Eggs"

E. J. Reefer: Wilburton, Kan.
It is the first time I got so many eggs in winter. When I began using "More Eggs" I was only getting from 1 to 3 eggs per day and now I am getting 11 to 13 eggs per day. MRS. JULIA GOODEN.

18 Hens—12 Eggs a Day

E. J. Reefer: Luray, Va.
Six weeks ago I began giving "More Eggs" Tonic and I was not getting an egg from 18 hens, and now I am getting 10 to 12 every day. You can quote me as saying that it is the best chicken tonic in the world. R. L. REYNOLDS

"37 Eggs a Day"

E. J. Reefer: Elwood, Indiana
That More Eggs Tonic is simply grand. When I started using it they did not lay at all, now I get 37 eggs a day. Yours truly, EDGAR E. J. LINNIGER.

"Increases from 8 to 36 Eggs a Day"

E. J. Reefer: Shady Bend, Kansas.
I am well pleased with your More Eggs Tonic. I was only getting 8 or 9 eggs, now I am getting 3 dozen a day. Yours truly, WM. SCHMIDT.

"Doubles Egg Production"

E. J. Reefer: Paradise, Texas.
I have been using More Eggs Tonic 3 or 4 weeks and must say it is fine. My egg production has been doubled. J. C. KOENINGER.

"Increase from 2 to 45 Eggs a Day"

Reefer's Hatchery: Derby, Iowa
Since I began the use of your More Eggs Tonic 2 weeks ago I am getting 45 eggs a day, and before I was only getting 2 or 3 a day.
Yours truly, DORA PHILLIPS.

Questions and Answers

C. J., Maine. What is meant by "the principle of self-determination" in the case of the nations which formed the former Austrian Empire?

About 60,000,000 people, who once formed parts of the Russian, Austro-Hungarian and German empires, inhabit a belt of country that stretches from the Baltic to the Adriatic and Black Seas. The fate of these people, together with that of the inhabitants of the Turkish Empire, will be decided in the Peace Conference. Some of the races and languages have already grouped themselves in nationalities which exist as yet only on paper, but this tentative grouping will no doubt be largely followed by the Peace Conference, although the practical application of principles will be attended with great and in some cases unforeseen difficulties.

Three considerable nations are emerging from the chaos attendant upon the breakup of the old political systems—Poland, Czechoslovakia and Jugoslavia. Each of these is formed around a nucleus which already existed as a nationality, and in the case of Jugoslavia around a nation (Serbia), which existed at the time of the breaking out of the world war.

The Poles claim as their territory the old kingdom of Poland, substantially as it existed before its partition between Russia, Prussia and Austria. This will take from Russia the territory known as Russian Poland; from Germany the provinces of Posen and West Prussia and Silesia in Prussia; and from Austria the small duchy of Silesia and the crownland of Galicia. The reconstituted Poland would have an area of 110,747 square miles, about the size of Italy, and nearly 30,000,000 inhabitants. Its seaport would be Danzig, on the Baltic Sea. Czechoslovakia will be formed out of the Austrian provinces of Bohemia and Moravia, with a large slice of Hungary which is inhabited by Slovaks. Of its population of 9,000,000 three-quarters are Czechs (Bohemians and Moravians), and the remaining one-fourth are Slovaks. The United States has recognized the Czechoslovaks as a nation and as one of our allies in the war.

The nation of Jugoslavia will be formed around the existing Slavic kingdoms of Serbia and Montenegro, to which will gravitate nearly 8,000,000 Croats, Slovenes and Serbs of Austria.

Besides these three new nations, Italy and Rumania claim extensive slices of territory. Italy has long wanted to annex the part of Austria lying at the northern end of the Adriatic, which the Italians call Italia Irredenta (unredeemed Italy), and which is peopled by Italians, with Trieste as its seaport. Rumania claims the part of Hungary known as Transylvania, which contains 3,000,000 Rumanians. These do not by any means exhaust the list of nations which the Peace Conference will have to deal with. There is Albania and the parts of Macedonia inhabited by Greeks, and European Turkey, which, with Constantinople, will no doubt be separated from the remnants of the Turkish Empire. When the new nations are set up, they will form a body across middle Europe like that which the Germans planned to establish with the aid of Austria and Bulgaria. Considering that these races were subjects of the Central Empires, the situation contains an element of poetic justice. One is reminded of the doom pronounced on another wise king who misused his wisdom: "I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and will give it to thy servant."

Well-Wisher, Dawn, Mo., sends this very pertinent suggestion, which will have a familiar sound to many of our readers: "While the men of ten talents are discussing the problems of the Church after the War, perhaps we who are less talented can offer some suggestions on other phases of the Church after the War. Has it ever occurred to the American parent that a great injustice has been done to our young people on Sunday morning and evening by allowing the children to leave before the sermon? It is a grievous fact that, in our cities and towns, the children are free to go home or elsewhere after the Sunday school hour. This is a source of grief to many beloved pastors who feel, however, that it is not their place to urge the young people to stay for church. Why not make a resolution for the New Year to do our utmost, by precept and example, to induce our children and young people to stay for the preaching, and thus gladden the heart of the minister and gain untold benefit to their own souls? It may take patience to plead with them to break loose from old habits, but it will pay large dividends to both parent and child."

Our Missouri reader, of course, has doubtless in mind the fact that all sermons would not interest or attract very young minds. Yet the suggestion that there should be something in the morning service peculiarly applicable to childhood and youth is an excellent one. We can think of no better way than that of our friend Dr. Farrar of Brooklyn, who, early in his ministry, appreciated childhood's claims and introduced the custom of preaching a ten-minute sermon to the children immediately before the regular Sunday forenoon discourse. And how they did crowd to hear that short sermon! Not only the children themselves, who lined up there fresh from their places in the Sunday school, but fathers and mothers and other relatives, all eager to hear the little ones sing and join in the service.

BECAUSE I AM SO VERY SMALL

By Margaret E. Sangster

BECAUSE I am so very small,
 This lil' squirrel ain't 'fraid at all—
He comes an' sits a-side of me,
An' acts as friendly as can be,
An' eats th' peanuts 'at I bring,
An' acts as nice as anything!

I sometimes wish 'at he could speak,
For all he ever does is squeak—
I sorter feel perhaps he'd say,
"I think it's awful nice, th' way
You come into th' park to see
A tiny lil' squirrel like me!"

You see, I am so very small,
He isn't scared of me at all!

Inquirer, Charlotte, N. C. We have no personal knowledge of the religious affiliation of the official you mention.

J. M. De V., Mount Pleasant, Mich. 1. We cannot find the author of the quotation you mention. 2. The use of the phonetic spelling of words became a fad some years ago, but soon died out except as to some few publications and writers who still cling to it. There is rather more good than harm in the method.

J. G. N., Waitman, Ky. The Song of Solomon has had many interpreters. The passage in chapter 1, verse 5, is explained by some commentators as an image drawn from the black goatskins with which the Arabs in Arabia Petrea covered their tents, contrasted with the splendid state tent in which the king was awaiting his bride, according to Eastern custom—the contrast typifying the darkness of man's natural state. This, however, is only one of several interpretations. Some regard the whole song as an epithalamium or poetic setting of an Arab wedding-song.

M. H., Plainfield, Ind. 1. Joaquin Miller's name is pronounced Waukeen. 2. The passage in Gen. 4 : 24 is regarded as a poetical one. The tradition is that Naamah, daughter of Lamech, became the wife of Ham. Lamech is supposed to refer to the fact that he had avenged himself on a young Canaanite who had wounded him, and that this speech was an apology for the homicidal act, which he explained as justifiable, having been committed in self-defense. Another version of the passage is: "A young man I slew because he wounded me; a young man because he assaulted me; if indeed Cain be avenged seven times, then Lamech seventy times seven." Most of the commentators regard the speech of Lamech as an outburst of proud, presumptuous self-confidence—"the boast of a bold, bad man, elated with the possession of arms, believing that with such weapons as his son had invented he could defy the world," and administer his own revenges.

J. N. M., Wichita, Kan. The passage in Ex. 20 : 13 (from the Decalogue) is interpreted as meaning that "Thou shalt not commit murder—thou shalt not slay with premeditation and malice." This meaning is rendered in the Septuagint. It not only includes the actual perpetration of murder, but every deed that tends to the danger of life as well as to personal injury.

J. L. H., Galesburg, Ill. We have never heard that the starving of Persia have dug up the dead for food.

Mrs. S. L. C., Hastings, Neb. The passage in Isa. 65 : 20 speaks of the longevity of men in the millennium age, in which they shall again enjoy the patriarchal years of the first age of the race. The commentators hold that a free translation would make the passage mean that infants who only live a few days will be unknown; that none should die without attaining a full old age; and that a hundred years would be thought to be youth and not age, and the death of one at that age would be esteemed as a visitation of God's wrath upon the individual. Sin and death would still exist, but less frequently than now.

S. C. C., Goshen, Ind. Many secular writers and historians, among them Pliny, Porphyry, Tacitus, Suetonius, and others, mention in their writings the Christian religion and its founders. Porphyry, though an enemy of Christianity, recorded his esteem of Jesus as "a most wise and pious man, approved by the gods and taken up into heaven for his distinguished virtues." The emperor Alexander Severus is referred to as having thought so highly of Christ that he would have admitted him into the number of his deities and have built a temple for him, had not his pagan subjects opposed it. The Actæ Pilati, or official memoirs of Pilate's administration, which were transmitted to Rome according to custom, are said to have contained an account of all the leading events in Christ's later earthly career, including doubtless the crucifixion. Tacitus wrote that Jesus was put to death under Pontius Pilate, who was procurator of Judea. The Jews in their earliest writings referred to him ignominiously as the man who was crucified, and his followers as "the servants of the crucified person." Lucian employed a similar term.

A. F. B., Machpelah, N. C. Abib is the first month in the Hebrew ecclesiastical year and was afterward called Nisan. It began with the new moon at the time the first grain ripened in Palestine. Abib is rather the designation of a season than the name of a month, as "the month of the new grain," "the month of flowers." The word means literally to fructify, as "a head or ear of grain." The Abib of the Pentateuch was replaced by the Nisan of the Captivity.

J. V. S., Caledonia, N. Y. Each different denomination has its own special manner of dealing with membership requirements. As a matter of fact, however, if the applicant be sincere in the desire to follow Christ, there are usually no conditions imposed by the churches that cannot be complied with. No barriers are put in the way. Where the requirements relate to non-essentials, they are usually asked more as a matter of form than anything else.

B. H. M., South Carolina. A commentator says: "The correct reading of Mark 3 : 28-30 seems to imply that the unpardonable sin, though it may begin with one act of blasphemy, results in a state of sinful activity which continues forever. For this reason it is unpardonable. The punishment is perpetual, because the sin is perpetual. The sin excludes pardon because it excludes repentance. That is the most fearful aspect of eternal punishment, namely, being deprived forever of the needed influence of the Holy Spirit and hence in a state of eternally growing sin and guilt. Conscious existence is evidently implied. Further, while the next verse suggests a particular form of unpardonable sin, this phrase favors the view that it is an active rather than a passive act." Applying this view to your own case, we may repeat what we have so often said, that no one who is repentant or worried about the unpardonable sin has really committed it, for to have done so takes one entirely outside of the influence of the Holy Spirit and into a state of mind in which he does not care whether he has committed the sin or not. Do not worry—go to Him who has a cure for sin.

J. A. C., Youngstown, Ohio. You have stumbled on the same old objections to the Bible that have bothered many before you. There can be no doubt that Christ and his apostles accepted the whole of the Old Testament as inspired. And ever since their day, the view of the universal Christian Church has been that the Bible is the Word of God. Whatever view or theory of inspiration men may hold, they refer either to the inspiration of the men who wrote or to the inspiration of what is written. In a word, they imply throughout the work of God the Holy Ghost, and are bound up with the concomitant ideas of authority, veracity, reliability and truth divine. It is perhaps not pleasant to the supersensitive reader to find in the Old Testament proof of the weaknesses and sins of the mighty in Israel; but those being the facts, would you have the writers suppress them? Is that your idea of a truth-telling book? Do not let us be led astray at this late day by the same old objections that the enemies of Christ have ever raised. Let the devil and his satellites do their utmost, they cannot shake its authority.

T. G., Ellisbury, Pa. The way to start a thing is to start it. You say you have a lovely church. Cannot some of your church brethren and sisters join you in forming a prayer league, which no doubt would soon attract others?

A Believer. We cannot see why a consecrated Christian should not attend a moving picture show of the right kind. Like everything worldly, moving picture shows must be taken by Christians advisedly. It is usually possible to learn beforehand what sort of an entertainment is provided, and one may choose that which does not conflict with his ideals. Travel, exploration, science, are all within the reach of the "movies." A pretty love story, a stirring war drama, a moral-teaching play, are never out of the way for a Christian's eyes. There can be no one set of rules —the individual conscience must be the guide.

The Easy Way To Buy a Typewriter

By Burton Wynne

"Everyone now can afford a typewriter—with the famous $100 Oliver selling at $57 and easy terms of $3 per month. Now no one need use longhand—even for personal correspondence.

"A fore-sighted plan makes the Oliver the universal writer both in business and in the home."

Mr. Wynne states here the amazing facts which make the Oliver easy to get, easy to buy, easy to learn.

IT takes a stirring story of real commercial daring to make an imprint upon the war-filled mind —a story with a distinct shock.

And here it is. Even before the war it would have created a furore in commercial circles.

I relate here the story of how The Oliver Typewriter Company set itself against all precedents, all tendencies, and in times when most men are content to ride with the tide, how Oliver executives dared to liberate the public from extravagant typewriter prices.

As for the shock, let it be stated briefly at the beginning:

The $100 Oliver now sells for $57!

The Company asks less instead of more!

Say what you will about increased production making up the difference—it takes courage for a great, long-established concern o "right about face."

Oliver Strategy

Foresight prevailed at the conferences when the Oliver Plan was conceived. The future pointed to radical economic changes.

Here is the idea as stated by an Oliver official:

"We will take the $43 that it is costing us o sell an Oliver and subtract it from our tandard price of $100. Let the buyer keep his $43.

"Let him buythe Oliver direct. Let him ave every cent possible.

"We can offer the identical Oliver, without a single change, for $57 by this new way of distribution. It is tomorrow's way, when all will practice thrift.

"Low price and easy terms, together with our new and easy way to learn to operate he Oliver quickly, makes typing possible or all."

And so by preparation, The Oliver Typewriter Company, with the Nation's Declaraion of War, was able to announce a new way of selling typewriters.

The announcement brought a terrific inrease in sales. Orders and inquiries poured in. Within a month, the plan had been voted n astounding commercial success.

Other thousands outside of business were ble to give up tedious longhand. The Oliver plan made it possible.

The Oliver is easy to learn, having a tandard keyboard. And if requested when rdering, "The Van Sant System of Touch Typewriting" is included free, the same ourse used by prominent business colleges.

The Identical $100 Model

The Oliver Company took the public into ts complete confidence. It published a book, ntitled "The High Cost of Typewriters—The Reason and the Remedy."

This book and each Oliver advertisement ells how as well as why the price of brand new, latest model Olivers was reduced to $57. They tell where the $43 used to go.

During the war we learned that it was unnecessary to have great numbers of traveling salesmen and numerous expensive branch houses throughout the country. We were also able to discontinue many other superfluous, costly sales methods. You benefit by these savings.

In dozens of ways, Oliver executives have gained new economies for the public, without sacrificing quality one iota. Every selling waste is taboo.

A copy of "The High Cost of Typewriters—The Reason and the Remedy" is yours, if you mail the coupon. It is free—there is no obligation.

Simply Self-Selling

Here is the easy way to buy an Oliver. Note that you are your own salesman.

Remember, we ship only new Olivers, not rebuilt, not second hand.

First, you mail the coupon below for either a free trial Oliver or for further information. When you ask for the free-trial Oliver, it comes immediately without your paying a single penny for it.

Note that it is brand new, never used. That it is the latest model, No. 9.

Keep it for five days. Use it as if it were your own. Compare it. Match its speed and workmanship. Note the wonderful carbons and stencils it makes.

Then if you want to own it, send $3 per month until the $57 is paid.

Throughout trial you are the sole judge. It must sell itself by every test.

Now $57

You can learn to use the Oliver quickly. Our free course is simple. Anyone can learn—school children included.

If you don't want the Oliver, return it, express collect. You are not under the slightest obligation to buy. Even the out-going transportation charges are refunded.

That is all—absolutely all—there is to the New Oliver plan. All round-about ways are pruned. Your Oliver comes from the Oliver factory, which is at Woodstock, a suburb of Chicago. Here the Oliver has been built for over twenty years.

Save $43 Now

There is no need to pay $100 for $100 Olivers now. And there is no need now for anyone to be without a typewriter, with such a rock-bottom price and such easy terms.

Over 700,000 Olivers have been sold. Many of the country's greatest businesses use The Oliver—such concerns as The United States Steel Corporation, Montgomery Ward & Company, Baldwin Locomotive Works, Pennsylvania Railroad, Bethlehem Steel Company, National City Bank of New York, Hart, Schaffner & Marx, Diamond Match Company, and hundreds of others.

In the business world, the Oliver is a greater success than ever. And now it enters a more universal field, it is available for all—even school children, whose lessons can be typed. And it is being bought by farmers, professional men and individuals with considerable private correspondence—people who hitherto have depended on longhand.

You should take advantage of the $57 Oliver.

So do not wait. Mail the coupon now.

Just Among Ourselves

The New Spirit of 1919

NOW that the holidays are over and glorious days they have been, with peace and gratitude sitting at the table in every American home -we are getting a little more accustomed to our new bearings. Father and mother move about the house with smiling and contented faces, the crowds we meet on the streets are happier and lighter-hearted than before, their greetings kindlier, and in the great world of business the whole line of vision has been lifted perceptibly higher. In our hearts, as a nation, we have been "thanking God and taking courage." And surely we have abundant cause to be grateful for this new spirit which the New Year has brought to us, and also to all the world.

No more days full of forebodings and nights oppressed with the dread of what tomorrow might bring! No more anxieties that tear the heart and make life a heavy burden for us to bear. Our boys are coming home! They are here already by the tens of thousands, their bronzed and smiling faces full of confidence, and all eagerness to get back again to the old familiar channels of duty. Our fleets, too, are here in impressive array, and we regard them proudly, remembering what splendid service they have done! The myriad wheels of industry are revolving again, their whirr singing the tunes of the old days of full production. Never were the shops so crowded, nor the marts of trade so stimulated to unwonted enterprise. Never did a nation take up its accustomed tasks with such lightness of heart or such confidence; never were the material prospects of any people brighter than are ours today.

This is the gift of the New Year. It tells us to take courage and go ahead. Long delayed enterprises spring into new life: the cloud has lifted, and the business world rejoices in the sunshine. It has come out of the ordeal not only unscathed, but stronger and better and surer of the success of its work than ever.

But the new spirit has made us also wiser. We have learned that there are other and better uses for wealth than mere selfish accumulation for the sake of power or pleasure. The war has drilled into us the conviction that we are only trustees of our possessions, for the use of which we must be morally accountable. In this time of greatness and prosperity, we must remember this, and as a people and as individuals so guide our affairs with wisdom and discretion that we can be the real masters of our possessions and not their slaves. In his Pilgrim's Progress, Bunyan tells of Christian's visit to the Interpreter's house, in one room of which he saw a man raking straws and dirt together with a muck-rake. So intent was the man on this that he could not spare a moment to look upward, where a shining figure held over his head—near enough to be had for the reaching—a jeweled crown!

After all, riches are uncertain. They "take wings," the good Book tells us. Let us make good use of them while we have them, remembering the proverb: "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth but tendeth only to poverty."

So let us resolve, in these days of good resolutions, to follow this wise counsel and help along every good cause as far as our means permit. Such generosity is never money wasted, and it always brings a rich and generous blessing with it.

Don't Forget Our Advertisers

ADVERTISING men agree that 1919 should by all rights be a very big year for business. This means that Christian Herald readers will be introduced to new friends through its advertising pages. Every advertisement appearing in the Christian Herald receives most careful scrutiny before being accepted by our Advertising Department. This care is taken for the protection of our readers, so that only advertisers of character may receive an introduction to Christian Herald readers through its advertising pages. It is good business to trade where you receive this protection.

Mr. Babcox Our New Secretary

THE Christian Herald's President and Publisher, Mr. Graham Patterson, has found in Mr. Edward S. Babcox, the new Secretary of the Christian Herald, a most efficient and valuable aid. We want our readers to get acquainted with Mr. Babcox. For a young man he has had an extensive business experience. For six years he was Advertising Manager of the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company of Akron, Ohio. He is President of the Audit Bureau of Circulation, and has also served as Vice-President of the Association of National Advertisers. His strong predilection for religious journalism led to his acquiring an interest in the Christian Herald, and he is now looking forward to new opportunities for broader service on religious and humanitarian lines, in the field of applied Christianity. He is sure of a cordial welcome from the members of our Family Circle.

Good Things to Come

World Reconstruction

IN the spiritual and moral readjustment and reconstruction of the world now upon us, the Christian Herald intends to take that large part, that leadership, which its position in the religious world makes it both natural and imperative that it should take. Never before in world history did the religious press have such responsibility and opportunity as it will have in the coming year, and we will be found meeting each responsibility and welcoming each opportunity.

A survey of the many problems to be met in the world reconstruction—religious, social, economical, political and geographical—will appear in next week's issue. It will be a summary and digest of the best information and clearest thought that are extant on this great subject. This coming article will afford every reader a comprehensive grasp of the manifold problems to be met.

High Class Short Stories

WE ARE going to give our readers a Short Story every week, in addition to the serials. And our stories are going to be the very best obtainable. Leading story writers will contribute their work, and we shall be constantly on the lookout for promising new talent.

Fiction fitted to us must be in a class by itself. Our stories must not only be clean and wholesome, but inspiring and quickening of the best ideas and impulses.

"A Chance Detective"

by Annie Hamilton Donnell, in next week's issue, is a typical Christian Herald story. Tell your folks to join the big happy family of readers of our stories.

Next Week's Issue

IN NEXT week's issue Dr. Sheldon's great serial ends with a vision of the missionary conquest of the world by a united Church, and with Requa Randall, ready now to go into "All the World," meeting Dick Ward in Jerusalem. Hand in hand they walk to Bethany, and there we leave them.

Dr. James M. Gray, through whose scholarship for more than ten years we have been kept in touch with the latest developments in the unfolding of prophecy, begins next week what will probably be his final series of studies, the first article being "How to Interpret Prophecy."

Dr. David J. Burrell, in next week's sermon, leads our thoughts from channels of self to the Royalty of Christian Service.

Next week John Cameron—Corporal Cameron now—finds this world, this life and the next inexplicable without God, and he starts out to find him. Then he gets a violet-scented letter.

In Coming Issues

DR. CLARK, in the sketches of his life-story, tells two weeks from now of some great conventions in which the spirit of youth was turned into the channels of Christian Endeavor.

All of us have our ideas about peace and the League of Nations. In an early issue a manufacturer, James W. Johnson, will give a business man's view of "Versailles—and After."

Germany has joined Russia among the world's questions. What next? is in every mind in Germany and out. Very shortly Nevin O. Winter, in "The New Germany," will give direction to the main strands of the tangle, if he does not solve it.

A Palestine Orphanage

THERE has come to the Christian Herald Family a wonderful new opportunity for consecrated service. We are going to have our own orphanage for the needy little ones of the Holy Land. This will need much planning, much money, much work, but oh, the glorious results! The "Little Country" made sacred by the birth and life and death of Jesus shall by our united efforts in this spirit be redeemed from its decadence and despair, and made to ring with hopeful praise and joyous laughter.

We will have more to say about this later, but meanwhile we ask that prayers may embrace this project. Our Christmas Chest has, this year, ministered to the orphans of the Christ land.

About Delays, Complaints and Subscriptions

OUR announcement stating that the subscription price of the Christian Herald would advance to $2.50 on January 1, but that we would give all our readers an opportunity to renew at the old rate of $2.00, brought in a flood of subscription orders.

We find it impossible to handle these orders as quickly as we would like to. There will therefore be some delay in getting books to those who ordered them, and also in changing the expiration date on the wrapper of the Christian Herald. We ask all our readers to be patient and to wait at least a short time before complaining.

We are doing our utmost, and want to assure our readers that we will be caught up on all orders in a reasonable time.

Please remember that the subscription price of the Christian Herald is now $2.50 a year and this amount should be remitted for each yearly subscription. For those who desire to subscribe to other magazines in addition to the Christian Herald, we have arranged very advantageous combinations at much less than the regular subscription prices. A list of these special magazine clubs was given in last week's issue. If you do not find there the particular magazines you desire, send us a list of those you want and we will guarantee as low a price as any responsible agent or publisher.

Third Bible Picture Study

PATIENCE is always a virtue and we appreciate the patience of the participants in the Third Bible Picture Study. Everything possible is being done to hurry up the final decision as to those who best applied the spirit of the Study to their choice of verses. Altogether there were nearly 50,000 sets of answers submitted.

First we had to arrange these books according to numbers. Then we had to compile from all the books lists of all the verses given as answers to each picture. There were thirty pictures and an average of four answers to each. Thirty multiplied by four and then by 50,000 equals 6,000,000. So you see we had to make six million comparisons, check back these six million again to insure absolute accuracy and then prepare the lists of verses for the judges.

These lists have been in the hands of the judges for some time, but we expect a final decision any day. When the judges report we will then have to check their decisions against the 50,000 books to determine the identity of the successful contestants. This will be done as fast as hands and eyes can operate correctly.

Good Books Coming

THE Christian Herald has organized a book department with a manager of many years' experience in the making and selling of good books. The coming year we will make many money-saving offers to the Christian Herald Family of books of a high educational and entertaining value. We ask for a careful consideration of these forthcoming offers. Many of them will be by special letters.

Every book offered by the Christian Herald can be depended upon to be exactly as represented—well made and deserving a place in your permanent library. You are to be the judge, and must feel absolutely satisfied or your money will be refunded.

Color Views of the Holy Land

IT is gratifying to us to receive so many orders for our booklet containing ten Color Views of the Holy Land. We recommend that every reader send for at least one of these booklets before the supply is exhausted. Complete announcement on page 56.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald, at the Bible House, Fourth Avenue, 8th and 9th Sts., New York City. The Officers are: Graham C. Patterson, President and Treasurer, Bible House, N. Y. City; Geo. H. Sandison, Vice President, Bible House, N. Y. City; Edward S. Babcox, Secretary, Bible House, N. Y. City.

The victors pass. The flagship Pennsylvania and the battleship squadron passing in review

Our Victory Fleet's Welcome Home

ADMIRAL SIR DAVID BEATTY, commander of the Allied Grand Fleet, told the American sailors and marines of Battle Squadron No. 6, American Navy, that the great ships they served so well had been the last straw which broke the back of German naval resistance. Having been completely defeated in the battle of Jutland by the British alone, the Germans dared not risk conclusions after the American fighting ships had reinforced the British line. Thus it came about that the German Navy, once contender for the ancient British supremacy at sea, came out not to fight but to surrender, and America's navy, by this surrender made next greatest in the world, had earned its full share of the credit for this spectacular but unprecedented victory. The victory won, there was no further need of the great gray ships abroad, and they turned their faces homeward, the 300-foot homebound pennants flying from their mastheads. They were scheduled to reach New York on December 23 and a great review was planned for the following day, at which Secretary Daniels for the nation should welcome home the victors from overseas. But storms delayed the big ships, and before they were half way across, it became evident that they could not reach their home port before Christmas Day. The review was therefore postponed until the twenty-sixth. As the fleet drew nearer home, the powerful wireless station at Annapolis picked up the ships and their progress westward was flashed to all the country. Part of the destroyer squadrons, which had been hunting submarines, started to return with the battleships; but the continuous rough weather finally forced them to take a more southerly course, and their part in the great review was postponed.

The dreadnought Pennsylvania, Admiral Mayo's flagship, came to anchor in the outer harbor of New York at 2 o'clock on Christmas afternoon, followed shortly afterward by the nine other ships. Secretary Daniels reached New York by train on Christmas evening and went at once aboard the Presidential yacht Mayflower, in the Hudson. Secretary of War Baker, Mrs. George Dewey, widow of Admiral Dewey, Secretary Houston, General March, Admiral Grant of the British Navy and others were guests of Secretary Daniels on the Mayflower. The great review was being held on the anniversary of the birthday of the late Admiral Dewey, and it was appropriate that the widow of the victor of Manila Bay should share in the tribute to the victors of today.

The Mayflower moved down the Hudson and anchored near the Statue of Liberty at 9:30 Thursday morning. As she came to anchor, wireless telephone connection was established between her and the Pennsylvania, and the Secretary and Admiral Mayo exchanged greetings. The dreadnought Arizona, leading the fleet, passed through the Narrows at 9:30. Ahead of the Arizona steamed the gunboat Gloucester, towing a huge sausage balloon which gave its observers a wild ride in the snow-laden squalls that were sweeping the harbor. Overhead flew sea planes, but the weather made flying difficult and one of them was forced to land in Gravesend Bay. As the Arizona came in line with the Mayflower, her great guns boomed out the nineteen-gun salute to the Secretary of the Navy and the Mayflower's little guns barked back the seventeen-gun salute to the Admiral. The salute was the signal for every siren and whistle afloat or ashore in the great city to clear its throat and screech. Snow squalls and the wind-blown smoke of the ships masked the pageant more or less completely from those massed along the shore and piers to see it, but did not in any degree diminish their enthusiasm.

Coming up the harbor and into the Hudson, the big ocean fighters swept along quite near to the sea-wall at the Battery; and the thousands of people gathered there cheered and waved their flags, the men aboard ship answering with voice and banners, while the great whistles kept blowing continuously. Every pier and every vantage point in the buildings facing the river was black with people who defied the storm; and at last, as though to reward them or to add his own greetings to those of the nation, the sun broke through the clouds as the ships came to anchor in the Hudson.

The order of the ships in line was Arizona, leading, Oklahoma, Nevada, Utah, Pennsylvania, New York, Texas, Arkansas, Wyoming, and Florida. As the fleet prepared to anchor and the Mayflower was about to move up to her place in the line off 98th street, the army transport Saxonia came along with 2,000 men from the fighting fields of France. The men cheered the Mayflower and the latter blew her whistle, and thus the army came to share in the Navy's day of triumph.

Meanwhile the returning warships dropped into the anchorages designated for them between 55th Street and 115th Street. Stretching northward past 180th Street, the giants of the home fleet, which had made its base at York Harbor, Maryland, during the war, swung at anchor along the New York shore of the Hudson, headed by the big New Mexico and her sister ship the Mississippi. Along the Jersey shore a line of destroyers and torpedo boats paralleled the six-mile line of capital ships. At 10:30 A. M. the Mayflower steamed around the fleet, passing northward along the Jersey shore to a point opposite Fort Washington and returning down the New York side of the stream. As soon as she reached her own place in the line, the commanding officers of the ships came on board to pay their respects to Secretary of the Navy Daniels.

This was only the beginning of the day's events. The crowds who had lined the wharves and piers to watch the ships come in, hurried up to Riverside Drive to see the sailors coming ashore, and other crowds rushed uptown to pack the sidewalks along Broadway and Fifth Avenue. At 11:30 the bluejackets began to land and at 1:25 P. M., with Rear Admiral Rodman in the lead, the parade of 6,000 jackies and Marines, the nation's best, started from 96th Street and Broadway. Down Broadway to 59th Street, they swung, hearty-looking sailor lads, merry at the thought of shore leave in "the good old U. S. A." The people packed on the sidewalks, filling the windows, lining the parapets of the roofs, cheered and applauded them until the echoes rang and throats refused to function. Along most of the route, the store show windows had been reserved for wounded soldiers and sailors, and these saw the parade comfortably, in spite of recurring snow squalls, although they had to cheer through plate glass. The falling, swirling, melting snow was merely an incident to the crowds. They were out to welcome home their boys and nothing could dampen their ardor. What was a snow squall to the cold and perils those sailor-boys had faced in the North Sea? So the parade marched gaily across 59th Street to Fifth Avenue and down Fifth Avenue past the reviewing stand at the Public Library to 22nd and 24th Streets, where it turned

President Wilson's Christmas

PRESIDENT WILSON spent Christmas with our soldier boys in France. He followed his heart to the camps and laid aside conferences with statesmen to spend a few rare hours with the clean, fine young men whose coming onto the field of combat was the signal for the end. Leaving Paris at midnight on the twenty-fourth, the President reached Chaumont, the headquarters of General Pershing, at 9 A. M. The Associated Press correspondent, describing the scene, said that a drizzling cold rain was falling from overhanging gray clouds when the President's train entered the station, "but the soldiers said that the weather was exceptionally fine, as compared with the usual brand, and every one had a broad smile beaming above his mud-bespattered khaki uniform. The folks back home would have called it the dreariest of Christmas Days, but it was the greatest one in history for these American troops, and evidently a very happy one for the President. He was ready for the 'big day' and looking forward to every feature. He remarked that the rolling country looked not unlike Virginia."

After being formally received by the Mayor of Chaumont, the President and his party motored to Humes, twenty miles distant, where the President formally reviewed a body of 10,000 picked American troops under the command of General Alexander. The troops were from the 6th, 26th, 29th, 77th, 80th, and 82nd divisions, and the parade was wound up by a detachment of fifteen tanks which plowed their way through the mud past the President. Following the review, the President ate his Christmas dinner with the men, using a regular military kit. Later, he and Mrs. Wilson dined with General Pershing.

Before the review, the President addressed the men who were to march by. From the reviewing stand, set in a natural amphitheatre in the Vosges foothills, our Commander-in-Chief, 3,000 miles from home, but on soil no longer wholly foreign since it has been consecrated by American blood, shed for Liberty, addressed his victorious troops while French villagers mixed with the crowd, lending a picturesque touch to what would otherwise have appeared as American an event as if it had transpired on our own shores.

General Pershing, speaking for the army, addressed the President thus:

"MR. PRESIDENT and Fellow-soldiers—We are gathered here today to do honor to the commander of our armies and navies. For the first time an American President will review an American Army on foreign soil—the soil of a sister republic, beside whose gallant troops we have fought to restore peace to the world.

"Speaking for you and your comrades, I am proud to declare to the President that no army has ever more loyally or more effectively served its country, and none has ever fought in a nobler cause.

"You, Mr. President, by your confidence and by your support, have made the success of our army, and to you, as Commander-in-Chief, may I now present the nation's victorious army."

In replying, President Wilson said:

"GENERAL PERSHING and Fellow-comrades—I wish that I could give to each one of you the message that I know you are longing to receive from those at home who love you. I cannot do that, but I can tell you how every one has put his heart into it. . . . You have done your duty, and you have done it with a spirit which gave it distinction and glory.

"And now we are to hail the fruits of everything. You conquered, when you came over, what you came over for, and you have done what it was appointed for you to do. I know what you expected of me. Some time ago a gentleman from one of the countries with which we are associated was discussing with me the moral aspects of this war, and I said that if we did not insist upon the high purpose which we have accomplished the end would not be justified

"Everybody at home is proud of you and has followed every movement of this great army with confidence and affection. The whole people of the United States are now waiting to welcome you home with an acclaim which probably has never greeted any other army, because our country is like this country—we have been so proud of the stand taken, of the purpose for which this war was entered by the United States.

"You knew what we expected of you, and you did did it. I know what you and the people at home expected of me, and I am happy to say, my fellow-countrymen, that I do not find in the hearts of the great leaders with whom it is my privilege now to co-operate any difference of principle or of fundamental purpose.

"It happened that it was the privilege of America to present the chart for peace, and now the process of settlement has been rendered comparatively simple by the fact that all the nations concerned have accepted that chart, and the application of these principles laid down there will be their application. The world will now know that the nations that fought this war, as well as the soldiers who represented them, are ready to make good—make good not only in the assertion of their own interests, but make good in the establishment of peace upon the permanent foundation of right and of justice.

"Because this is not a war in which the soldiers of the free nations have obeyed masters. You have commanders, but you have no masters. . . . And everybody concerned in the settlement knows that it must be a peoples' peace and that nothing must be done in the settlement of the issues of the war which is not as handsome as the great achievements of the armies of the United States and the Allies.

"It is difficult, very difficult, men, in any formal speech like this to show you my real heart. You men probably do not realize with what anxious attention and care we have followed every step you have advanced and how proud we are that every step was in advance, and not in retreat; that every time you set your face in any direction you kept your face in that direction. A thrill has gone through my heart, as it has gone through the hearts of every American, with almost every gun that was fired and every stroke that was struck in the gallant fighting that you have done; and there has been only one regret in America, and that was the regret that every man there felt that he too was not in France.

"It has been a hard thing to perform the tasks in the United States. . . . It has taken a lot of moral courage to stay at home. But we are proud to back you up everywhere that it was possible to back you up. And now I am happy to find what splendid names you have made for yourselves among the civilian population of France, as well as among your comrades in the armies of the French. . . .

"I feel a comradeship with you today which is delightful. As I look down upon these undisturbed fields and think of the terrible scenes through which you have gone I realize how the quiet of peace, the tranquillity of settled hopes has descended upon us. And, while it is hard far away from home, confidentially, to bid you a Merry Christmas, I can, I think, confidentially, promise you a Happy New Year, and I can from the bottom of my heart say, God bless you."

The Beginnings of Christian Endeavor

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

III

IN MY last article I told about my happy pastorate in Williston Church in Portland, Maine, and how year after year a deep religious interest prevailed in connection with the Week of Prayer, and many accessions to the church gladdened the heart of the pastor.

But yet he was not satisfied; for many of the young converts, though upright and blameless in life, so far as he could see, were doing little for the church of which they were members. To be sure, they were all in the Sunday school, either as teachers or scholars; they attended church regularly, and were often at the prayer-meetings, both the mid-week church prayer-meeting and the young people's meeting; for we had a young people's meeting for years before the first Christian Endeavor Society was formed.

That is, it was a young people's prayer-meeting so-called, for which half a dozen older Christians, who carried it on with the aid of the pastor, felt the responsibility. These gray-haired young people were excellent Christians, but they did not need the meeting for their own growth in grace, and the talks they gave and the prayers they offered were of no special help to the dumb majority who did need the training of the young people's meeting.

It is true that these old or middle-aged "young people" could talk and pray much better than the fledgling Christians who never took part; but for that very reason they should not have taken much part, but should have left the hour largely to the inexperienced and bashful who needed to hear their own voices in prayer and testimony.

IN OTHER lines of church activity the young converts of Williston Church, like the young converts of most churches, were doing very little active Christian work. Not that they were to blame, for there was very little for them to do in the average church. The minister, the deacons, the Sunday school superintendent and teachers, the good women of the missionary society and the sewing circle, unconsciously monopolized all the lines of service and left precious little for any one else to do, and that little was far from precious, being frequently unimportant duties connected with the sociables or Christmas entertainment, which made no demands on their spiritual energies.

No wonder that the pastor of Williston Church was dissatisfied with the young people's work in his church, and spent no little time in prayer and thought as to what more he might do for them or get them to do along distinctly religious lines.

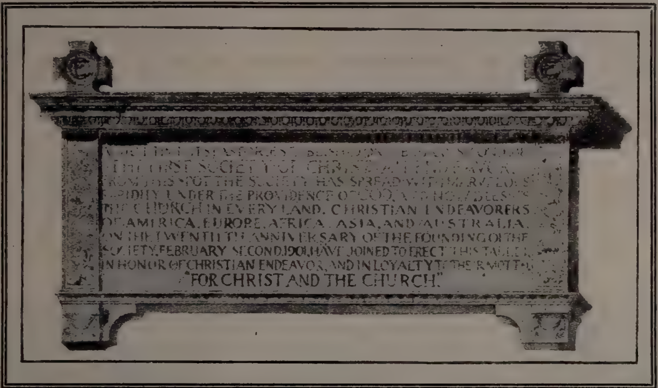
At first he made the mistake of thinking that he must coax them, and make the church attractive by secular activities. So he started a debating-club for the young men and a musical evening for all, and spent much time, with the help of his inventive wife, in arranging pleasant socials with games and readings. These efforts were not useless; they made the church attractive in a certain way, but they had no staying power. In the language of the day, they soon "petered out," and like Barnum's circus posters they had to compete with themselves to make each social evening a little more attractive than the last, lest it pall on jaded appetites.

No wonder the pastor came to the conclusion that he was on the wrong tack, and that something more serious, more strenuous, more really Christian, was necessary to bind the hearts of the young converts to the church and to set them at work for her.

THEN came the question, What should this something be? The pastor's faith at first was not equal to the thoroughgoing belief that the young Christians could actually welcome a religious meeting and religious work for which they should be wholly responsible. Were they not for the most part shy and timid, unused to hearing their own voices in public or taking the initiative in religious service of any kind? Would they not very likely break down if they attempted to take part in the meeting, much more if they tried to lead a meeting?

Yes, indeed, that contingency must be foreseen, as well as much bungling and immature work on the committees, and in all kinds of practical Christian effort. But what of that? It would be a mere nothing compared with the untold benefit of a self-moved, voluntary effort to do the Master's service. At length that pastor saw no other way of practical training that was worth a straw, except to let these young Christians, under his general oversight and guidance, set their own tasks and thus work out their own salvation from spiritual sloth, however often they bungled and failed of complete success.

A carpenter never learns to build a house by reading a treatise on architecture or listening to a lecture on the principles of construction. He must take the hammer and nails, the saw and the plane, in his own hands, however awkward those hands are at first. An artist who never took up a brush and palette or mixed his colors would never paint a picture, however well he understood the technique of painting.



THE FIRST SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR
FROM THIS ROOT THE SOCIETY HAS SPREAD WITH MARVELOUS
RAPIDITY UNDER THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD, AND NOW BLESSES
THE CHURCH IN EVERY LAND. CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS OF AMERICA, EUROPE, AFRICA, ASIA, AND AUSTRALIA, ON THE TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF THE SOCIETY, FEBRUARY SECOND 1901, HAVE JOINED TO ERECT THIS TABLET
IN HONOR OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, AND IN LOYALTY TO THEIR MOTTO
"FOR CHRIST AND THE CHURCH."

Memorial Tablet, Williston Church, Portland, Maine

So a Christian who never tries to speak or pray or sing, who never serves on a committee or plans or executes any religious service, will never be a working Christian, though he hears sermons and studies catechisms till he is a hundred years old. There is no failure like the failure to attempt anything; no spiritual disaster like spiritual idleness.

Name. This Society shall be 2 called the Williston Young Peoples Society of Christian Endeavor.

Object. Its object shall be to promote an earnest Christian life among its members, to increase their mutual acquaintance, and to make them more useful in the service of God

Membership. The members of this society shall consist of all young people who sincerely desire to accomplish the results above specified.
They shall become members upon being ~~de~~ elected by the society & by signing their names in this book.

Though these principles were firmly settled in the mind of that Portland pastor, he was by no means certain how he could embody them in practice. Prayer and thought and the study of the young life in which Williston Church abounded at last convinced him that there was more real heroism in the hearts of young Christians than most people had given them credit for, and that if he could touch this chord in their natures the rest would be comparatively easy. He also believed that if he could induce them, by presenting the highest motive, "For Christ's sake," to sign a definite promise to do certain things which at first they might find it very hard to do, they would for the most part live up to their agreement.

SO, ON the second day of February, 1881, he drew up in the study of the Williston parsonage a constitution of a proposed society which he called the "Williston Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor." It was substantially the constitution adopted today by these societies all over the world, a constitution which has been translated into a hundred languages and dialects and reprinted at least fifty million times! Of course there have been additions and minor changes to meet the changing needs of the times; but in its essential features it is the same today as thirty-eight years ago.

In it was the substance of the much-discussed pledge which begins: "Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I promise him that I will strive to do whatever he would like to have me do."

In the constitution, too, was the provision that every member was expected to attend every meeting and take some part aside from singing, unless prevented by a reason which he could conscientiously give to the Master.

This pledge has been the sheet-anchor of the society from that day to this. It has been objected to, derided, picked to pieces by some older people, but it has also been adopted loyally and lived up to by many millions of young Christians, who have found in it the mental and moral stimulus to do their duty faithfully, not only in the prayer-meeting, but in all lines of Christian service.

Hundreds of men and women, among them many ministers and missionaries, have told me that their Christian Endeavor pledge first of all gave them a realization of their duty and a strong purpose, God helping them, to do it.

In the constitution of the society then framed was also a provision for various committees, the Prayer-meeting, Lookout, Social, Missionary committees, etc.

The evening of February 2 came—a cold, sharp evening, the mercury in the low zeros; the snow creaked under the runners of the sleighs and sleds. The pastor's wife had been busy all the morning making cookies for the boys and girls of her "Mizpah Mission Circle," who were to come early, while their older brothers and sisters were expected later in the evening.

By seven o'clock or half past they had mustered in full force, fifty-seven in all—average young men and women, with a large sprinkling of boys and girls who in these days would be formed into a Junior Society. After prayer for guidance, the constitution was read and explained by the pastor. He dwelt upon the seriousness of the obligations involved, upon the duty and privilege of young Christians showing their colors, doing the hard thing, "whatever he would like to have me do"; the importance of the weekly meeting, and the equal importance of the practical service demanded by the committees.

"With these explanations in mind," said the pastor, "how many will sign this constitution and live up to it?"

THERE was an ominous pause. The pledge involved looked severe and unrelenting. No young people had been asked to promise such things before. Even the deacons of the church had not made such definite vows. The pastor began to fear that he had expected too much.

At length Mr. W. H. Pennell, a middle-aged man, teacher of a large Bible class of young men, advanced toward the table on which the constitution lay, and said:

"Come on, boys, I'll sign it if you will."

Thus the ice was broken, and one after another all in the room came up and signed their names, and the first Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor was an accomplished fact.

But the pastor's anxieties were not yet all relieved. Would the young people live up to their promises? The next prayer-meeting would show. It was a revelation of what a young people's meeting might be. It was a Pentecostal day for Williston Church. Every member was present. Every one took his part "aside from singing." Very simple, modest participation it was—a verse of Scripture, a sentence of prayer, a few words of purpose and resolve; but it was such a meeting as Williston Church had never known.

Britain Acclaims American President

President Wilson's Tribute to His Mother

From His Address at Lowder Street Church, Carlisle

IT IS with unaffected reluctance that I inject myself into this service. I remember my grandfather very well, and, remembering him, I can see how he would not approve. I remember what he required of me and remember the stern lesson of duty he spoke. And I remember painfully about things he expected me to know that I did not know. There is another reason why I was reluctant to speak. The feelings excited in me today are really too intimate and too deep to permit of public expression. The memories that have come of the mother who was born here are very affecting. Her quiet character, her sense of duty and her dislike of ostentation have come back to me with increasing force as these years of duty have accumulated.

Yet perhaps it is appropriate that in a place of worship I should acknowledge my indebtedness to her and her remarkable father, because, after all, what the world now is seeking to do is to return to the paths of duty, to turn from the savagery of interests to the dignity of the performance of right.

WHEN President Wilson stepped on the shore of Britain at Dover on December 26, England welcomed, for the first time, an acting chief magistrate of that democracy of the western continent, which, though separated from her by a political convulsion 142 years ago, has still called her the "mother" country. Since 1776 Britain and the United States have developed together, through similar ideals, interrelated laws and a common literature, a broad, deep and far-reaching ideal of democratic liberty, which now they seek to make the ideal of the world.

Taken to the heart of France, accepted as 24 karat fine by the people of the Boulevards, Mr. Wilson, crossing the Channel on December 26, reaching Dover at noon, became at once the man of the hour in England. Everywhere crowds acclaimed him, cheering until the echoes rang, crying "hear, hear" when he spoke and demanding speeches at every appearance. Old Londoners declared the reception to America's President exceeded in demonstrativeness the jubilee celebrations of Queen Victoria.

Mr. Wilson and his party reached London about the middle of the afternoon of Thursday. He and Mrs. Wilson were met at the Charing Cross station by the King and Queen, the Princess Mary and many ministers, and important personages. The head of the Government of the Union was received with full state ceremony and given all the deference of visiting royalty. The President and the King reviewed the American and British guards of honor at the station, the President shaking hands with the officers. In the procession which formed to proceed to Buckingham Palace, the President and the King rode together in the first carriage and Mrs. Wilson and the Queen in the next. Mounted equerries in scarlet coats and gold lace rode alongside to make way for royalty and all the pomp and ceremony in which England still revels marked the progress of this democrat of democrats, in his black coat, through the streets of England's capital.

The first conference between Mr. Wilson and English statesmen began with the arrival of Premier Lloyd George at the Palace at 10:30 Friday morning. Mr. Balfour followed him and the conference ended at 1:30, just in time for the participants to reach a luncheon given by the Premier to the President at his residence in Downing Street. Here the President met many notable men whose relation to the British or American or Allied Governments made them factors in the coming discussions in Paris. Following the luncheon Mr. Wilson, Mr. Balfour and Mr. George remained again in conference, this conference, like that of the morning, being informal.

In the evening the King and Queen entertained at a State dinner in honor of their guests. Here again a notable company gathered and neither red coats, gold lace nor royal ceremony were omitted. The dinner set the President far forward toward complete agreement with British leaders, for in the formal address of the King and in Mr. Wilson's reply the essential unity of the aims of the two nations was clearly revealed. The King pictured America and England as guardians of a democratic ideal of liberty which they were now about to present to the world and the President, accepting the King's idea of the joint obligation of the two nations to apply the moral judgment of the world to the particular settlements about to be attempted, caught the popular fancy in England by declaring that "There is a great tide running in the hearts of men. Men have never before been so conscious of their brotherhood. Men have never before realized how little difference there was between right and justice in one latitude and another."

Presidents Wilson and Poincare in France. The smile with which Mr. Wilson responded to their acclamation won the hearts of the French people

ON SATURDAY morning at the famous Guildhall, the President was presented with the freedom of the city and officially welcomed to London town. Replying to the Lord Mayor's address Mr. Wilson, in a speech considered the most important one during the visit, declared that in all the welcomes he had received he had noted one voice, a voice of thankfulness that the fighting was over and of pride in the culmination of the fighting. "But, he said, "there was something more in it, the consciousness that the business is not yet done, the consciousness that it now rests upon others to see that those lives (the lives of the men who have died) were not lost in vain."

He said that as he had talked with the soldiers he had become more and more aware of the fact that they had fought to do away with the old order of a "balance of power" determined by the sword," a balance which was maintained by jealous watchfulness and an antagonism of interests which though it was generally latent was always deep-seated. . . . It is very interesting to me to observe how from every quarter, from every sort of mind, from every concert of counsel there comes the suggestion that there must now be, not a balance of power, not one powerful group of nations set up against another, but a single overwhelming, powerful group of nations who shall be the trustees of the peace of the world."

Mr. Wilson declared it had been delightful to find how the minds of the leaders of the British Government "moved along exactly the same line, and how our thought was always that the key to the peace was the guarantee of the peace not the items of it." He said also that the ground had been cleared and that the statesmen of all nations had already accepted the same body of principles. In closing he said, "The peoples of the world want peace and they want it now, not merely by conquest of arms, but by agreement of mind. It was this incomparably great object that brought me overseas . . . it was my paramount duty to turn away even from the imperative tasks at home to lend such counsel and aid as I could to this great—may I say final?—enterprise of humanity."

At the close of the address, the audience of one thousand five hundred sprang, cheering, to its feet.

Following the formal exercises, the Lord Mayor entertained the President at dinner and the President made an address in a happy vein which cemented even more closely the already intimate understanding between himself and the British people.

Before going to the Guildhall Mr. and Mrs. Wilson went to the American Embassy, where they remained about an hour, receiving a number of delegations. Mr. Wilson insisted on shaking hands with every member of the embassy staff, and catching sight of some of the wives of members of the staff on the roof of the porch outside the windows of the drawing-room, he stepped out to greet them and was roundly cheered.

SATURDAY, December 28, was President Wilson's sixty-second birthday. King George called at the President's suite at 10 A. M. to wish him many happy returns of the day and to present him with a set of books as a birthday gift.

Mrs. Lloyd George entertained for Mrs. Wilson at five o'clock tea on December 28. The President was present and he and the Premier had further conferences in the evening.

President and Mrs. Wilson left London Saturday evening for Carlisle, the birthplace of Mr. Wilson's mother, in the north of England.

The mayor of Carlisle and his wife met Mr. and Mrs. Wilson at the station Sunday morning. It was raining and misty but there was a crowd on hand to see and welcome the town's illustrious guest. After visiting the site of his mother's birthplace, now occupied by a Salvation Army barracks, and the Cavendish House in Warwick Road, built by his grandfather, the Rev. Thomas Woodrow, and used by him as a school, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson proceeded to the Lowder Street Congregational Church, of which Thomas Woodrow was pastor, passing down the aisle to the strains of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," listed on the program as the American national anthem, the Presidential party was shown to a front pew. After the sermon, the pastor, Rev. Mr. Booth, asked Mr. Wilson to speak.

In a few words Mr. Wilson paid a tribute to the devotion to duty of his grandfather and to the quiet character of his mother, admitting his debt of gratitude to both. Referring to the war and its outcome he declared his belief that "It is moral force as much as physical force that has defeated the effort to subdue the world," and he said that this moral force was being accumulated "from quiet places like this all over the world."

Mr. and Mrs. Wilson left Carlisle at 1:15 P. M. for Manchester.

Mr. Lloyd George said on Saturday that the President had conferred with the representatives of the other Allies in Paris and had reached a complete understanding with them and that now that he had conferred in London with the British representatives it could be said that all the Allies were certainly in accord on basic principles.

MANCHESTER, the great center of trade in England, gave President and Mrs. Wilson such an enthusiastic and cordial welcome that he declared he felt at home and almost entitled to address them as "fellow citizens." After spending the night as the guest of the Lord Mayor, the President put in the morning visiting the great inland harbor and ship canal and seeing the city. Then he received the freedom of the city at the Free Trade Hall before some 4,000 people, signing his name in the book of the freemen of the city while the crowd, including the dignified aldermen, sang "For he's a jolly good fellow."

In introducing Mr. Wilson the Lord Mayor said "What he dared to dream of, that he dared to do." And he referred to the fact of the President's presence in England as proof of the real reunion of sentiment between the two nations.

In replying President Wilson made a speech second only in importance to his Guild Hall address in London, because in it he declared that the League of Nations must be a union of all if America were to participate.

An American Commission to Turkey

By DR. SAMUEL T. DUTTON

AIDED and abetted by the Germans, the Turks have succeeded in almost destroying what remained of their own national structure. Blinded by selfish ambition and greed, they entered the war against civilization and at the same time deliberately set at work to wipe out the Christian populations of the empire. They have largely succeeded, but in the meantime have been defeated in the war and are now appealing to America for aid. Realizing the vastness of their crimes and the tremendous force of the Allied powers which have shattered the whole Teutonic scheme, they are now looking to America for mercy and for help.

This greatest of all tragedies—that of Armenia—began three and a half years ago. Its inhuman and murderous assaults were directed to every section of the country, whether in the quiet valley or plain, or high upon mountain and plateau. The long story of outrages and butchery incident to this episode has been many times told, and the American people know of its horrors, its brutalities, its mutilations, its cruel and intentional deprivation of clothing, food and water; the stealing away of girls and young women, the ruthless and savage killing of young children—all of these things are matters of common knowledge and need not be repeated. The deed is done and recorded. Let us hope that those who planned and executed this orgy of misery may be properly punished by the Allied governments which have won the victory for freedom and humanity. The account with the Turks cannot be properly closed until that so-called Committee of Union and Progress which was responsible for all these horrors has been brought into court, tried and punished.

Mr. Morgenthau, in his interesting volume, recently published, has pictured these men in their true character and with such care and definiteness that there may be no doubt as to their guilt. It is safe to say roughly that more than 1,000,000 Armenians, 500,000 Greeks and 200,000 Syrians have perished. With them have perished much of the thrift, productiveness, industrial enterprise and mechanical skill of the nation. Among the victims were many men of education and professional standing as well as women of refinement, who in their homes and the circles where they resided were respected and loved, not only by their Christian neighbors but by Moslems as well. What a dark cloud of memories and shame hangs over the entire nation! It is not strange that the more decent elements in Constantinople have risen in anger and disgust and have driven from posts of trust the authors of this great crime. The large army of martyrs who suffered every misery and death at their hands cannot and will not be entirely forgotten. Their homes are scattered all the way from the Black Sea coast and the Caucasus to Aleppo, Mosul and the desert beyond. Of thousands of families not one member remains. By that remarkable resiliency with which children are endowed, many have survived, and it is estimated that at least 400,000 orphans are to be cared for.

THE thought of these children and many others who have escaped death suggests a view of the situation more hopeful but tremendously urgent. The war is over. The Allies are in Constantinople. Lines of communication and travel so long interrupted will soon be reestablished. A new and better government will be devised for Turkey, insuring an end of the cruel massacres which have so long disgraced and tortured that land. The American Committee for Relief is about to send to Turkey a commission of half a dozen men of standing and experience, with a small army of missionaries and expert workers, including doctors and nurses. They hope to go directly from New York in a government transport and take with them medical supplies, food, materials for the manufacture of clothing, implements of agriculture and industry, including tractors and motor trucks. These workers will be placed in groups in the important centers of Turkey to begin the work of rehabilitation. Thousands of surviving refugees will be repatriated in Armenia. Sanitary and medical relief will be provided. The scattered remnants of the Christian population will come back to their villages. Those who have seized their homes and belongings will, we trust, be compelled to restore them.

It may be that some of the wealth of Armenians and Greeks which the Turks stole from them when they were driven from their homes will find its way back to aid in reestablishment of those who, weary and impoverished, come straggling back to their homeland. What scenes of sadness mixed with joy will be witnessed! The lone mother who has been sorrowing in the loss of husband and children may be gladdened by the appearance, as from the dead, of a daughter, a son, or even a husband, who, under the cover of darkness, escaped from the gendarmes. Many such have been in hiding far from their homes in the mountains, perhaps, or other such inaccessible regions. Many no doubt have been fed and protected by Moslems, some of whom denounced the cruel treatment of their Christian neighbors and pitied the innocent victims.

The American Committee has now something more to do than merely to deal out bread to prevent starvation. It must rebuild homes, plow the ground, plant all kinds of seeds and supply animals. It must open many orphanages and place over them kindly and well-educated matrons. It must see that the Allied governments police thoroughly all sections of the country in danger of attack or where some vengeful uprising is possible. All who have believed in the war as a beneficent struggle for humanity will wish to do their part in this great redemptive work in the Near East. They will give and give again, as they have been doing so generously, in order that happy homes may again gladden that land sacred to all Christians as the land of the prophets, of Jesus and the apostles, the land packed with the history of ancient peoples and the early triumphs of the Christian Church. America stands high in Turkey, for her missionaries have been noble men and women giving examples of upright living and self-sacrifice. The schools and colleges which they have planted and which have been closed during the war will soon be in full operation again. The three great independent institutions, one in Beirut and two on the Bosphorus, providing the higher education for both men and women, have in a miraculous way kept their doors open and continued their splendid work during the wars of the last seven years. They also may justly claim support by Americans. They have earned it and deserve it for what they have done. In the years to come when democracy is to bud and blossom, these institutions are to furnish the men and women who are to do valiant service in the name of humanity and Christianity.

The War Work of the Society of Friends

THE unassuming but very efficient relief work that has been lone for four years by the Society of Friends is one of the oldest and most extensive of the private beneficences that have been carried on in France. Mr. Charles Evans, chief of the American Friends' Unit, tells of a trip through owns where they are at work. His etter, somewhat condensed, follows:

"Leaving Paris in the evening we raveled down to Troyes in a beautiful harvest moonlight, arriving there at midnight. Every one seems to be crowded at Troyes, but they are looking oward relief by the construction of a wooden hut in which the men will sleep.

"Next evening we left on bicycles for he sanitarium which Friends are building for Dr. Bertrand, about four kilometres outside of Troyes. About twenty-eight children will be cared for in sunshine and fresh air. Just outside of Troyes our men are also putting up twenty huts for refugee families, some of whom are living four together in a single room ten by ten feet.

"In the afternoon of Sunday I went down to Bar-sur-Aube. This quaint little town we have been working in only for a short time. Much work is done in the outlying villages and the relief there partakes of a somewhat different nature from that in the congested cities. The great difficulty is to get materials and furniture. The work of our Friends here is excellent and Miss Kelsey has been of great use in visiting the hospital where American soldiers are cared for.

"The next morning I left for Sermaize, and after visiting the Château hospital a few hours, left in the car for Charmont. Miss Ferris has charge here of twelve old ladies, some of whom are refugees from Verdun. They love the tranquillity of the spot and say they will never leave there. I cycled over through Nettancourt to Evres. Here I found an active group repairing mowing-machines and acting as village blacksmiths. The American and French tools which had been sent them are of great value. I saw groups of men arrive at the blacksmith shop with damaged machine parts which our men would repair or replace for them.

"It was interesting to see the large number of visitors coming to see their friends in the hospital and to see the gratitude which they felt to those who had helped members of their family back into reasonable health again. The out-patient work at the hospital, which is conducted in a small out-building or conservatory, has assumed considerable proportions and makes a further draft upon the time of the doctors and attending nurses. The sixty beds are not sufficient and it is proposed to place an additional barrack in the orchard which will accommodate from twenty to forty more patients.

"The X-ray apparatus is very successfully operated by Leslie O'Heath and C. F. Whitney and the results assist Dr. Babbitt materially in reaching proper diagnosis. Dr. Packer is working admirably, and in the absence of Dr. Babbitt, had performed a number of operations with success."

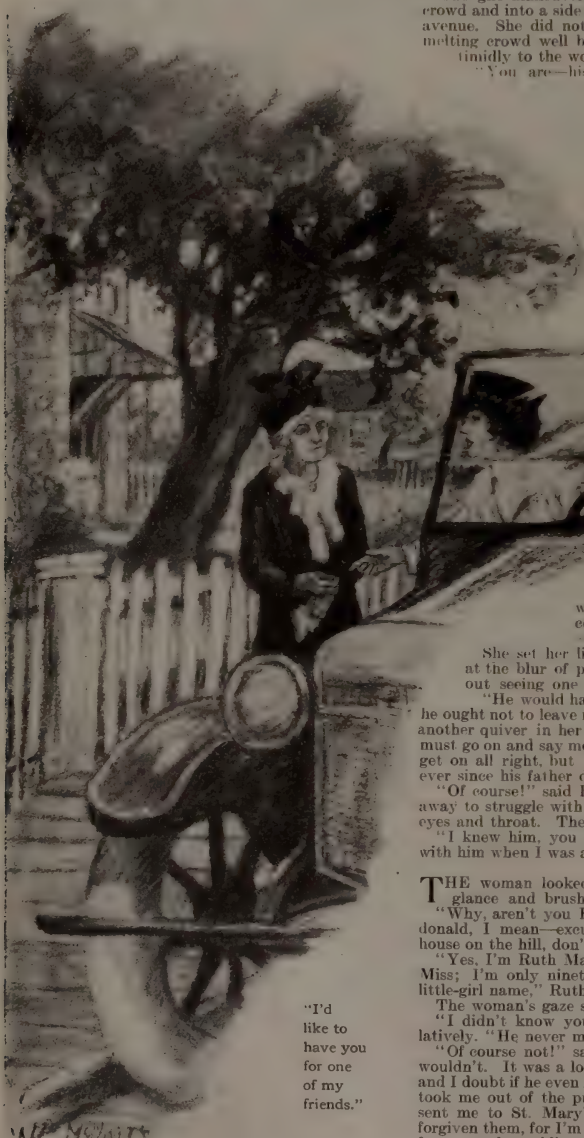
CHAPTER III

IT HAD taken only a short time after all. The crowd drowned its cheer in one deep gasp of silence, and broke up tearfully into little groups beginning to melt away at the sound of Michael ringing up the gates, and telling the cars and wagons to hurry, that it was almost time for the up-train.

Ruth Macdonald started her car and tried to bring her senses back to their normal calm, wondering what had happened to her, and why there was such an inexpressible mingling of loss and pleasure in her heart.

The way was intricate for a moment with the congestion of traffic, and Ruth was obliged to go slow. As the way cleared before her, she was about to glide forward and make up for lost time, when a little bewildered woman with white hair darted in front of the car, drew back in hesitation and went forward again. Ruth stopped the car shortly, shaken with the swift vision of possible catastrophe, and then recognized something familiar in the droop of the woman's shoulders, the set of the white head they carried.



"I'd like to have you for one of my friends."

"Oh, I'm so sorry I startled you!" she said pleasantly, leaning forward. "Won't you get in and let me take you home?"

The woman looked up, and there were great tears in her eyes. It was plain why she had not seen where she was going.

"Thank you; no, I couldn't!" she said with a choke in her voice and another blur of tears. "I—you see—I want to get away—I've been—seeing off my boy—"

"I know!" said Ruth sympathetically. "I saw. And you want to get home quickly and cry. I feel that way myself. But, you see, I didn't have anybody there, and I'd like to do a little something just to be in it. Won't you please get in? You'll get home sooner if I take you; and see! We're blocking the way!"

THE woman cast a frightened glance about and then assented.

"Of course; I didn't see!" she said, climbing in and sitting bolt upright, as uncomfortable as could be in the luxurious car beside the girl. It was plain she did not wish to be there.

The girl maneuvered the car quickly out of the crowd and into a side street, gliding from there to the avenue. She did not speak until they had left the melting crowd well behind them. Then she turned timidly to the woman:

"You are—his—mother?"

She spake the words hesitatingly as if she feared to touch a wound.

The woman's eyes suddenly filled again, and a curious quiver came on the strong, handsome chin.

"Yes!" she tried to say, and smothered the word in her handkerchief pressed quickly to her lips in an effort to control them.

Ruth laid a cool little touch on the woman's hand that lay in her lap.

"Please forgive me!" she said. "I wasn't sure. I know it must be awful—cruel—for you!"

"He—is all I have left!" the woman breathed with a quick, controlled gasp; "but—of course—it was right he should go!"

She set her lips more firmly and blinked off at the blur of pretty homes on her right without seeing one of them.

"He would have gone before, only he thought he ought not to leave me till he had to," she said with another quiver in her voice, as if, having spoken, she must go on and say more. "I kept telling him I would get on all right, but he was always careful of me—ever since his father died."

"Of course!" said Ruth tenderly, turning her face away to struggle with a strange smarting in her own eyes and throat. Then, in a low voice, she added:

"I knew him, you know! I used to go to school with him when I was a little bit of a girl."

THE woman looked up with a quick, searching glance and brushed the tears away firmly.

"Why, aren't you Ruth Macdonald? Miss Macdonald, I mean—excuse me! You live in the big house on the hill, don't you?"

"Yes, I'm Ruth Macdonald. Please don't call me Miss; I'm only nineteen, and I still answer to my little-girl name," Ruth said with a charming smile.

The woman's gaze softened.

"I didn't know you knew John," she said speculatively. "He never mentioned—"

"Of course not!" said the girl, anticipating. "He wouldn't. It was a long time ago when I was seven, and I doubt if he even remembers me any more. They took me out of the public school the next year and sent me to St. Mary's, for which I've never quite forgiven them, for I'm sure I should have got on much faster at the public school. But I've not forgotten public school, and John was always good to the little girls. We all liked him. I haven't seen him much lately, but I should think he would have grown to be just what you say he is. He looks that way."

Again the woman's eyes searched her face keenly, a if she questioned the sincerity of her words; then apparently satisfied, she turned away with a sigh:

"I'd have liked him to have known a girl like you," she said wistfully.

"Thank you!" said Ruth brightly. "That sound like a real compliment. Perhaps we shall know each other yet some day if fortune favors us. I'm quite sure he's worth knowing."

"Oh, he is!" said the little mother, the tears brimming over again and flowing down her dismayed cheeks. "He's quite worth the best society there is but I haven't been able to manage a lot of things for him. It wasn't always easy to get along since his father died. Something happened to our money But anyway, he got through college!" with a flash of triumph in her eyes.

"Wasn't that fine!" said Ruth, with sparkling eyes "I'm sure he's worth a lot more than some of the fellows that have always had every whim gratified Now which street? You'll have to tell me. I'm ashamed to say I don't know this part of town very well. Isn't it pretty down here? This house! What a wonderful clematis! I never saw such a wealth of bloom!"

"Yes, John planted that and fussed over it," said his mother with pride as she slipped unaccustomedly out of the car to the sidewalk. "I'm very glad to have met you, and it was most kind of you to bring me home. To tell the truth," with a roguish smile, "I was so weak and trembling with saying good-by and trying to keep up so John wouldn't know it, that I didn't know how I was to get home. Though I'm afraid I was a bit discourteous. I couldn't bear the thought of talking to a stranger just then. But you haven't been like a stranger, knowing him, and all!"

"Oh, thank you," said Ruth. "It's been so pleasant! Do you know, I don't believe I ever realized what an awful thing the war is till I saw those people down at the station this morning saying good-by. I never realized, either, what a useless thing I am. I haven't even anybody very dear to send. I can only knit."

"Well, that's a good deal. Some of us haven't time even to do that."

"You don't need to," said Ruth, flashing a glance of glorified understanding at the woman. "You've given your son!"

A BEAUTIFUL smile came out on the tired, sorrowful face.

"Yes, I've given him," she said, "but I'm hoping God will give him back again some day. Do you think that's too much to hope? He is such a good boy!"

"Of course not!" said Ruth sharply, with a sudden sting of apprehension in her soul; and then remembered that she had no very intimate acquaintance with God. She wished she might be on speaking terms at least, and she would go and present a plea for this sorrowful, lonely woman. If it were only Captain La Rue, her favorite cousin, or even the President, she might consider it. But God! She shuddered. Didn't God let this awful war be? Why did he do it? She had never thought much about God before.

"I wish you would let me come and see you some time, and take you for another ride," she said sweetly.

"It would be beautiful," said the older woman, "if you care to take the time from your own friends."

"I'd like to have you for one of my friends," said the girl gracefully.

The woman smiled wistfully.

"I'm only here evenings and holidays," she conceded. "I'm doing some work for the government now."

"I shall come," said Ruth brightly. "I've enjoyed you ever so much." And she started her car and whirled away into the sunshine.

"She won't come, of course," said the woman to herself as she stood looking mournfully after her, reluctant to go into the empty house. "I wish she would! Isn't she just like a lovely flower! How wonderful it would have been if things had been different, and there hadn't been any war, and my boy could have had her for a friend! Oh!"

DOWN at the club house the women waited for the fair young member who had charge of the wool. They rallied her joyously as she hurried in, suddenly aware that she had kept them all waiting.

"I saw her in the crowd at the station this morning," called out Mrs. Pryor, a large, placid tease, with a twinkle in her eye. "She was picking out the handsomest man for the next sweater she knits. Which one did you choose, Miss Ruth? Tell us. Are you going to write him a letter and stick it in the toe of his sock?"

Great Evangelist Passes Away

ON CHRISTMAS morning J. Wilbur Chapman, world-renowned evangelist, head of the New Era Movement of the Presbyterian Church, originator of the Simultaneous Campaign of Evangelism, and former Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, passed away at the Rebeau Sanitarium, 156 West Seventy-fourth Street, New York. The body was taken to the parsonage at 631 West End Avenue, where it lay in state until the following Sunday,

Dr. Chapman was born in Richmond, Indiana, June 17, 1859, and was the son of Alexander Hamilton Chapman and Lorinda McWhinney Chapman. He was graduated from the Lake Forest University in Illinois in 1879, with the degree of A.B. and from the Lane Theological Seminary in 1882, when he was ordained in the Presbyterian ministry, becoming pastor of the First Reformed Church at Albany, N. Y., where he served until 1890. For the next three years he was pastor of the Bethany Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia.

Twenty-five years ago he answered an insistent call to the evangelistic ministry, a work which he followed for the remainder of his life, though he was pastor during that time of two churches—the Bethany of Philadelphia, which he had left to take up evangelistic work, and the Fourth of New York, where he served with great success for five years.

HE BECAME in 1903 the executive secretary of the General Assembly's Commission on Evangelistic Work, and later representative at large. In his evangelistic work he introduced the system of simultaneous meetings in different parts of a city in which he might be conducting a revival, enlisting the assistance of ministers and church workers of different denominations, so as to make a revival city-wide. This was known as the Simultaneous Campaign of Evangelism. He found a worthy and efficient helper in Charles M. Alexander, the revival singer, with whom he made an evangelistic tour of the world. Among the features of present-day evangelism Dr. Chapman originated the Pocket Testament League, which has proved a valuable adjunct to evangelistic work. He was the inspiration of many of the younger generation of evangelists, among whom was Billy Sunday.

Dr. Chapman was the recipient of several honorary degrees in recognition of his services to the Christian Church. The title of D.D. was bestowed on him by Wooster University in 1898, and Heidelberg University in 1910 conferred the degree of LL.D.

BESIDES his widow Dr. Chapman is survived by two sons and two daughters—Captain J. Wilbur Chapman, Jr., in France with the 311th Remount Division; A. Hamilton Chapman, a student at Williams College; Mrs. Bertha I. Goodson, and Mrs. Fred E. Linder.

Dr. Chapman had for nearly thirty years been a contributor to the Christian Herald, in whose columns many of his sermons have appeared.

He wrote a number of religious works, among which were: "Received ye the Holy Ghost?" "And Peter," "When Home is Heaven," "Pocket Sermons," "Problem of the Work," "Present Day Evangelism," "Life of D. L. Moody," "Present Day Parables," "From Life to Life," "Spiritual Life," "Secret of a Happy Day," and "Kadesh Barnea."

The New Era Movement, which is one of the good works of Dr. Chapman, is the latest of the many activities with which the Presbyterian Church in the United States is striving to help the nation in its hour of struggle and after. It proposes to assist every Presbyterian church in the United States to get ready for a new type of community service for soldiers' families and for returning soldiers after the war, and includes methods of education for foreigners. It had its origin in the General Assembly Conference last May. The objects of the movement were presented to President Wilson in Washington, who told the group of clergy and laymen who visited him: "The church must help the nation to do the righteousness for which we are fighting."

Evangelist J. Wilbur Chapman. Died December 25, 1918

TWO impressive funeral services were held in New York City on Sunday, December 29. A morning service in the Fourth Presbyterian Church was followed by another in the afternoon at the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church. The burial took place in Woodlawn Cemetery.

Rev. Edgar W. Work, pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, presided at both services and read tributes to Dr. Chapman from members of his congregations and from evangelists and ministers who had been associated with him in evangelical work.

Vice President Marshall, who was unable to attend. sent this message:

"If duty ever called me to pay my personal respects at the funeral services of a great and good man it surely calls me to come to Dr. Chapman's funeral, and yet I cannot, because my duty is to the living at home, who need me. I do not seek to explain the passing of this personal friend, this illustrious Presbyterian, this great Christian and high-minded patriot. Had the war never come on, still Dr. Chapman would have lived in the hearts of those who loved him. but its coming brought immortality to him in the life of the nation.

"Early he saw that the fight was between Bethlehem and Berlin, and then he wielded the flaming sword of righteousness with such valor as to put behind him and back of his country the great denomination he so worthily honored, and which had so signally honored him. Till we meet again, rest to his ashes and peace to his soul."

Billy Sunday's message said that Dr. Chapman had always been his "truest friend." He added: "Next to the members of my family, I loved him more than any one else."

Other tributes came from John Wanamaker. a member of his former congregation in Bethany Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and from the Rev. Dr. J. Frank Smith, who succeeded Dr. Chapman as Moderator of the General Assembly.

The annoyed color swept into Ruth's face, but she paid no attention as she went about her morning duties, preparing the wool to give out. A thought had stolen into her heart that made a tumult there and would not bear turning over even in her mind in the presence of all these curious people. She put it resolutely out as she taught new-comers how to turn the heel of a sock, but now and then it crept back again and made her drop an occasional stitch.

Dottie Wetherill came to be shown what was the matter with her sock, and to giggle and gurgle about Bob and his friends. Bob, it appeared, was going to bring five officers home with him next week-end, and they were to have a party Saturday night. Of course Ruth must come. Bob was soon to get his first lieutenant's commission. There had been a mistake, or he would have had it in the first place; some favoritism shown of course, but now Bob had what they called "pull," and things were going to be all right for him. Bob said you couldn't do a thing in the army without "pull." And didn't Ruth think Bob looked perfectly fine in his uniform?

It annoyed Ruth to hear such talk, and she made it very plain to Dottie that she was mistaken about pull in the army. There was no such thing. It was all imagination and talk. She knew, for her cousin, Captain La Rue, was very close to the government and he had told her so. She fixed Dottie's stocking and moved on to the wool table to get ready an allotment for some of the ladies to take home.

MRS. WAINWRIGHT bustled in, large and florid, with a bunch of photographer's proofs of her son Harry, for Ruth to inspect. There were some fifty or more poses, each one seemingly fatter and more pompous and conceited looking than the last. She stated in her boisterous voice that Harry had particularly wanted Ruth's opinion before he gave the order. At that Mrs. Pryor bent her head to her neighbor and nodded meaningfully, as if the matter were settled now beyond all question. Ruth caught the motion and its meaning and the color flooded her face once more, much to her annoyance. She wondered angrily why she couldn't stop that childish trick of blushing, and why it annoyed her so very much this morning to have her name coupled with that of Harry Wainwright. He was her old friend and playmate, and it was but natural, when everybody else was sweethearting and getting married, for people to speak of them and wonder if there was anything more than friendship between them. Still it annoyed her. Continually as she turned the pages, from one fat smug Wainwright countenance to the next, she saw as in a mist the face of another man, with uplifted head and sorrow of parting in his eyes. She wondered if when the time came to go Harry Wainwright would have aught of that vision, and aught of that holiness of sorrow in his face.

She handed the proofs back to the mother, so like her son in her large blandness, and wondered if Mrs. Cameron would have a picture of her son in uniform, fine and large and lifelike such as these were.

She interrupted her thoughts to hear Mrs. Wainwright's clarion voice lifted in parting from the front door of the club house on her way down to her car.

"Well, good bye, Ruth, dear. Don't hesitate to let me know if you decide you'd like to have either of the other two large ones for your own 'specials,' you know. I shan't mind changing the order a bit. Harry said to give you your choice. I'll hold the proofs for a day or two and let you think it over."

RUTH lifted her eyes to see the gaze of every woman in the room upon her, and for a moment she almost felt she hated poor fat, doting Mamma Wainwright. Then the humorous side of the moment came to help her and her face blossomed into a smile as she jauntily replied:

"Oh, no, please don't bother, Mrs. Wainwright! I'm not going to paper the wall with them. I have other friends, you know. I think your choice was really the best of the lot." Then as coolly as if she were not raging within her soul, she turned to help Dottie Wetherill turn her heel.

Dottie chattered on above the turmoil of her soul, and her words were as tiny April showers sizzling on a red hot cannon. But by-and-by Ruth picked up Dottie's dropped stitches. After all, what did such things matter when there was war and men were giving their lives?

"And Bob says he doubts if they ever get to France. He says he thinks the war will be over before half the men get trained. He says for his part he'd like the trip over after the submarines have been thoroughly frightened. It would be something to tell about, don't you know? But Bob thinks the war will soon be over. Don't you, Ruth?"

"I don't know what I think!" said Ruth, exasperated at the little prattler. It seemed so awful for a girl with brains—or hadn't she brains?—to chatter on like that about a matter of such awful portent. And yet perhaps the child was only trying to cover up her fears, for she all too evidently worshiped her soldier brother.

Ruth was glad when at last the morning was over and one by one the women gathered their things together and went home. She stayed longer than the rest, making excuse to put the work in order. When they were all gone she rode around by way of the post office and asked the old postmaster who had been there for twenty years and knew everybody, if he could tell her what camp the boys had gone to that morning, and how one would address them; making an excuse that the Red Cross would likely be knitting for them. So he gave her the address which he thought would likely reach them, and she tucked it in her blouse and drove thoughtfully away to her beautiful sheltered home, where the thought of war had hardly dared to enter yet in any but a playful form. But somehow something was changed within the heart of Ruth Macdonald, and she looked about on the familiar place with new eyes.

Great Thoughts on a Great Occasion

IN HIS speech delivered in the spacious amphitheater of the Sorbonne—the famous French University—President Wilson lifted statesmanship to its highest level. It will be specially remembered for three specific expressions, although all of it may be classed as a memorable address. The first of these is the challenge to the world's educational institutions, which he gives in setting forth the principle that the chief object of education, above all others, is to rewaken the moral nature in men, that they may recognize right from wrong, justice from oppression and cruelty, and learn to differentiate between nations and peoples who are conscienceless and tyrannical and those who believe in the principles of international freedom and mutual helpfulness.

Seldom have we encountered a finer passage or a timelier in any address than that in which he describes the application of those principles to present conditions. He says: "The triumph of freedom in this war means that spirit shall now dominate the world. There is a great wave of moral force moving through the world, and every man who opposes himself to that wave will go down in disgrace."

The second great outstanding thought in the address is that in which he outlines his conception of the League of Nations: "That it shall operate as the organized moral force of men throughout the world, and that whenever or wherever wrong and aggression are planned or contemplated, this searching light of conscience will be turned upon them, and men everywhere will ask: 'What are the purposes that you hold in your heart against the fortunes of the world?' " These he strengthened still further by a timely thrust at secret diplomacy. "Just a little exposure," he said, "will settle most questions. If the Central Powers had dared to discuss the war for a single fortnight, it would never have happened. And if, as should be, they were forced to discuss for a year, the war would have been inconceivable." Further he declared that the true university spirit, which is intolerant of all the things that put the human mind under restraint, would have detected the falseness of the militaristic logic and exposed its vicious and oppressive selfishness.

The third affirmation of the President—which, as we learn by the cable, has shocked a certain class in Germany that seems to believe that the war-makers should go unpunished and that defeat is in itself a sufficient punishment—is that those who have been guilty of causing the world war must be made answerable for their crimes. Opposition to this is the more remarkable in view of the fact that a very large and influential part of the German people have been represented as demanding that those responsible for bringing about the war which has dismembered and ruined their nation should be compelled to answer to the German people themselves for their crime. Carl Kantsky, Under-Secretary of Foreign Affairs, is quoted as authority for the statement that official investigation has shown that "history will place the responsibility for the war and its continuance on the Kaiser, the Crown Prince, General Ludendorff, Admiral von Tirpitz, and on the nation's industrial leaders and the active promoters of Pan-Germanism." President Wilson has made no specific suggestion of a trial, and it is the uneasy German conscience that causes the guilty to dread the possibility of the Peace Conference taking up the task of bringing the aggressors to the bar. They are frightened lest "the great wave of moral force now moving through the world," to which the President alluded, may involve them and that, before German justice can operate in their behalf, they may get their full deserts.

All Europe and America will look forward with deep interest to what the Presdient may have to say to the people of the Allied countries. He has set a wholesome example of the benefits of free discussion in all that relates to world-welfare, and his treatment of great topics is meeting everywhere with cordial appreciation, as his forceful words appeal to the thinking classes of all shades of politics and every station in life.

Justice for the Jew

POLAND'S new government has announced its intention of taking measures for the suppression of anti-Semitism. This is a good beginning and augurs well for the future. The Jew has long been under the harrow, and Poland has not been the only nor the worst offender. Premier Moraczewski states that the Constituent Assembly, which will meet January 20, in declaring its aims will plan to reunite all the Polish territories, and to restore peace and order and establish equal civil and religious rights for all its peoples. The composition of the Cabinet is of a character that gives reasonable assurance of political harmony. Its principles, as the premier has announced them, are in accord with those of the Allies, and to a large extent also with those of the United States.

Rumania has been an aggravated oppressor of the Jews in times past, and should be made to fall into line in the application of the principle of equality for all the races within its boundaries. Turkey, or what is left of it, may be a more difficult problem; yet, strangely enough, the Jews have suffered less under Moslem authority than in Russia and certain other countries.

Under the new world order, anti-Semitism should soon become a thing of the past. The Jew can now look forward hopefully to the day when he will come into his own and when pogroms, Jew-baiting, and oppression in all its hideous forms, will never again be tolerated in any land or by any people.

The "Christmas Chest" and the Palestine Orphans

OUR "Christmas Chest" for the orphans of Palestine is filled to overflowing with the generosity of our friends and with abundant blessings for the suffering little ones in the land of Christ.

The fund which started in a contribution of $25 has quickly grown to about $2,000, and though Christmas day has passed by, the Christmas spirit still lingers in belated additions.

When the fund had attained to the sum of $1,500 that amount was sent by cable to the American Colony in Jerusalem, with this message:

> "Cabling $1,500 from our readers as Christmas gift to Orphanage. CHRISTIAN HERALD."

A later consignment, embracing the total accumulations during Christmas week, will have gone forward before this issue of our paper appears.

The "Christmas Chest" fund closes to contributions with most happy success, but the blessings to flow out of it on the other side are only beginning their glorious mission of brightening the gloom, relieving the sorrows, healing the sickness, and opening the door of hope for uncounted unfortunates.

Through this "Christmas Chest" there has been made clearly manifest a widespread popular and profound impulse to help the suffering orphans of the Holy Land in the true spirit of Christ. This impulse, shown by many thousands of spontaneous contributions, is, we feel sure, yearning to find steady outlet in more full relief and continuous helpfulness for the Palestine orphans.

In faith, we are going ahead with plans for a Christian Herald Orphanage in Palestine, that is to be as large as the consecrated generosity of our friends will permit, and as sweetly beneficent as their love and mercy, multiplied in the grace of God, may make it. The Palestine Orphanage plans will be prayerfully, carefully made for the consecration of every dollar to the best possible use in the spirit and under the blessing of Him who said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me."

A Noble Career

IN THE passing of J. Wilbur Chapman the world loses a great evangelist and the Christian churches of America are deprived of the services of one who has been for many years foremost among the leaders in all that makes for progressive religion. Dr. Chapman has not done distinguished service in his own denomination alone, for his great talents were employed in strengthening the faith of men of all denominations. In the broadest sense, he was a servant of Christ who knew how to become "all things to all men" for the sake of winning souls. His twenty-five years of labor as an evangelist, beginning with his association with Moody and lasting to the end of his life, were among the richest years in American evangelism. His great heart and his love of souls led him to make world pilgrimages, in which he spread the Gospel in all lands. Scores of pastors who have attained success in their spiritual work date the beginnings of their real career to their contact with Dr. Chapman and their adoption of his methods. In the great Gospel campaign in our armies he was one of the ablest organizers and most energetic leaders.

Dr. Chapman was a warm friend of the Christian Herald, a frequent and welcome contributor to its columns, and an ardent supporter of its varied philanthropies. He was a member of the Advisory Committee of the Bowery Mission and took a deep interest in its work. His sermons have been published in the Christian Herald at frequent intervals for many years, with great acceptability.

Of him it can be truly said that he lived a full life. His long period of spiritual service was magnificently rounded out and enriched with blessing to thousands.

Chairman Mott and the Y. M. C. A.

IT IS a wise step which has been taken by Dr. John R. Mott, the international head of the Y. M. C. A., to thrash out, by an official investigation conducted through army channels, the complaints that have been made against his organization. Indeed, he had intimated this purpose some time ago, and it is quite in line with the frank publicity that is characteristic of everything in his administration. Such an investigation would be thoroughly impartial and we believe satisfactory. We have every confidence in the Y. M. C. A, and its leaders. It is a great organization, with a high mission, capable of doing immense good, as its past record demonstrates. But the magnitude of the war and of many activities related to it have set unusually difficult tasks. With an army of thousands of workers, it would not be strange indeed if some of the Association men were not quite so efficient as others; but our knowledge of the organization and of the splendid service it has rendered, assures us that its work, judged as a whole, cannot suffer from investigation. If there have been weak spots, the inquiry will reveal them, and the organization will benefit by the process. The whole war itself was an ordeal through which no organized work could possibly pass without affording some ground for criticism, though assuredly much more for unstinted praise.

Another Aspect of Christian Unity

WHILE leaders in the religious life of the nation are earnestly discussing the desirability of finding a common basis of cooperation among the various denominations after the war, the Christian Union Quarterly, St. Louis, Mo., presents a new angle on this subject. The world war is upsetting our notions of education and religion, it remarks, and adds, "conditions that were justified in the past carry with them no guarantees of justification now. . . . To live with our faces to the front is to seek adjustment to the post-war demands. The tragedy of these times is a divided church.

"While statesmen are discussing a league of nations for the common good, churchmen should be giving themselves without reservation to the discussion of a united Church for the saving of the lost world. One of the chief barriers to unity and catholicity is the denominational school. It is not only the institution of a party in a distinct sense, being controlled and supported by a denomination, but it becomes a necessity for the perpetuation of that denomination, being the source from which denominational direction and guidance commonly come. The denominational schools ought to get together. It is both possible and practical. These times demand united effort. Pride and the love of a party must give way to service and the love of the whole Church."

It is quite within the scope of the general proposition for a closer union of all the Christian forces of America to include the denominational schools. If there is to be a leveling of fences so that the various branches of the Church can work with one common purpose, cooperating in the wide region of religious activities, both in home and foreign fields, a mighty step forward will have been taken. It is worth while to remark here that at a number of recent church conferences there has been noted a very definite tendency toward closer denominational relations, both as to spiritual fellowship and on humanitarian lines. A great deal of the old-time theological controversies have disappeared and the lines of division have in some cases hardly been in evidence. What is apparent, however, is that the world war and its turmoil have chastened the controversial spirit, and at the same time broadened the conception of Christianity. One thing which all earnest churchmen now see, as comprehending all others, is to bring the great divisions harmoniously into line, in order that every section, great and small, of the Christian army may do its full share in the task of spiritual reconstruction.

Church Unity Within Reach

As Democracy is the Organized Moral Force Throughout the World, So Christianity Can and Should Become the Organized Spiritual Force—By H. K. CARROLL, LL.D.

THE war's menace of Christian civilization brought about an alliance of nations to prevent the ruin of the world. Now that the menace has been removed, the minds of men everywhere turn to the question, How shall such wars be prevented in the future? As it was an alliance of nations that brought the war to an end and saved the world, so it must be an alliance of nations—call it a League of Nations or what you like—that shall prevent such a dire catastrophe in the future. This common sense approves and Christian sense enforces.

It needs no prophet's vision to foretell a new world. And in this new world the old diplomacy, which had its immoral as well as its moral phases, and which precipitated the war of 1870 between Germany and France, is to give place to a new diplomacy from which secrecy, untruthfulness and trickery are to be barred. Solemn treaties must no longer be called "scraps of paper." President Wilson, in his address at the University of Paris, in recognition of the degree conferred upon him, gave this as his conception of the League of Nations (italics not his):

"That it shall operate as the organized moral force of men throughout the world, and that whenever and wherever wrong or aggression are planned or contemplated, this searching light of conscience will be turned upon them, and men everywhere will ask, 'What are the purposes that you hold in your heart against the fortunes of the world?'"

That is to say, permanent peace must be founded upon justice, and justice is the principle of right, and right is always the opposite of wrong.

AS THERE is to be a League of Nations to maintain justice and peace upon the basis of open and even-handed dealing between all nations, small and great, and moral considerations are always to be uppermost, then surely no institution next to the State is more concerned to advocate and support this new diplomacy than the Church of Christ. The new internationalism means International Unity, and International Unity calls upon the churches for Interdenominational or Christian Unity. It is a thing unthinkable that the nations can make such an advance as this in the moral government of the world and the Church lag behind and make no response to this new call to what President Wilson calls "the searching light of conscience."

Therefore the call of the Philadelphia Conference to the Evangelical churches of the United States and Canada for union is not only a timely call but an imperative call. The question that will inevitably be suggested by so great an enterprise is, "Can it be done?" In reply to that, it is sufficient to ask, "Is it something that ought to be done?" If it is something that ought to be done, it is something that can be done. But as an answer to practical minds that entertain more doubt than faith on the subject, let me call attention to the words of the Preacher: "That which hath been is that which shall be; and that which hath been done is that which shall be done" (Eccles. 1 : 9). The object of this article is to show what has been done in actual organic union.

1. In 1745, the Presbyterian Church in this country was divided into two synods, known respectively as the Old Side and the New Side Synod. The causes of the division had chiefly to do with ministerial training and with revivals. Out of the New Side movement arose Princeton University. In 1758 the New Side and Old Side Synods came together.

2. Another great division in Presbyterian ranks occurred in 1837, resulting in what were known as the New School and Old School Presbyterian bodies. The New School Presbyterians cooperated with Congregationalists and others in supporting the American Board and on certain other practical lines. In 1869, these two large bodies came together in a perfect organic union, more than doubling their power and influence and their Christian efficiency.

3. At the outbreak of the Civil War, New School and Old School Presbyterians in the South were separated from the corresponding bodies in the North. During the war, these fragments in the South united and formed what is now known as the Southern Presbyterian Church, a strong, able, united, prosperous body.

4. In 1906, a large number of ministers, churches and communicants of the branch known as the Cumberland Presbyterian, originating in a revival in the first half of the nineteenth century, came into the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America. This was a perfect union so far as it went, and it might have been more complete except for undue pressure by the union party upon the minority in the Cumberland branch.

5. Prior to 1907, there were numerous Methodist branches in Great Britain. In that year there was a union in which the Methodist New Connection, the United Methodist Free Churches and the Bible Christians were united with other existing organizations. These unions were perfect unions, and as a result there is a further union movement on foot in Great Britain for the uniting of the four or five separate Methodist bodies which remain.

6. There is in Canada a united body known as the Methodist Church in Canada. There is no other Methodist body in the Dominion, save a small colored organization. Formerly there existed many branches of Methodism. Finding that division meant weakness and inefficiency, the process of organic union was begun, and it resulted in the disappearance of the several branches and the organization of a strong, prosperous, united body.

7. There were likewise in the beginning as many Presbyterian branches in Canada as there were in Scotland, and the fingers of one hand would not suffice to number them. The necessity of cooperation and concentration of strength brought about union after union, until all have been absorbed into a united whole known as the Presbyterian Church in Canada. Only a small body of Presbyterian churches connected with the Established Church of Scotland are outside of this union.

8. Organic union proving to be so successful in welding together the Presbyterian branches and the Methodist branches, a larger movement in the interests of greater efficiency and economy in men, means and efforts was set on foot, and the result is an agreement to unite the Presbyterian, the Methodist, and the Congregational churches. This movement was carried successfully and overwhelmingly in the Congregational and Methodist bodies; more slowly by the Presbyterians. Every time the question has been submitted to their General Assembly, it has voted by a larger majority.

9. What has been accomplished in the union of Methodist branches in Canada and in Great Britain has been accomplished also in the union of Methodist branches in Australia and New Zealand. The distinctive names, "Bible Christians," "New Connection Methodists," "Primitive Methodists," and the like, have been swallowed up, and there is but one body of Methodists in those dominions.

10. Coming back again to the United States, what is the United Presbyterian Church, a large, prosperous, unified body, but a consolidation of various smaller bodies?

11. The Civil War, which was responsible for many divisions, separated for a while the Southern from the Northern dioceses of the Protestant Episcopal Church. After the war their bishops and representatives were welcomed back into the General Convention, and the separation was but an incident and an interval which was happily ended.

12. Last year, three Norwegian Lutheran Synods, including the United Norwegian Church of North America and two other independent bodies, were brought together in a union which appears to have been successful in every respect.

13. The greatest union movement among Lutheran bodies that has been known in this country, if not in the world, was triumphantly consummated at a convention held in New York early in November, in which the General Synod, the General Council and the United Synod South, came together upon the basis of a constitution which had been accepted by each of the bodies, meeting separately, which had been approved by the different synods of each branch, and which was not the subject of a single amendment, addition, or erasure, from the time it was formulated and published by the Joint Committee until it became the actual platform for the large United Lutheran Church that now stands securely upon it. It is doubtful if any prophet would have ventured, when this project was first proposed a year and a half ago, to predict its success.

TIME and space would fail to tell of other instances of organic union which have been successfully and happily accomplished, the results being so large that it would be difficult to estimate them.

"That which hath been is that which shall be; and that which hath been done is that which shall be done."

Nor is there sufficient space left in which to give even a list of the denominations, separated for a longer or shorter interval, which are now proposing to come together again.

A few may be simply mentioned:

1. The reunion of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, bodies separated in 1844 and which are now negotiating with prospect of final success for reunion. This will be, when it is accomplished, probably not many years hence, the largest reunion that has ever taken place, bringing together Churches which have together more than five and a half million communicants.

2. There is a project for the union of three large colored Methodist bodies, namely, the African Methodist Episcopal, the African Methodist Episcopal Zion, and the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church. These three bodies are considering a basis of union which a Joint Committee has prepared, and already the General Conference of the last named Church has voted overwhelmingly in favor of it.

3. There is also a project for the union of the Presbyterian Church in the United States (Southern) and the United Presbyterian Church, which has been pending several years, and the Moderator of the last named body is quoted as having said in Philadelphia that "a year or two will see these two bodies one."

4. The Evangelical Association and the United Evangelical Church, which separated a generation ago, are conducting negotiations for a reunion.

5. So are the Free Methodist and the Wesleyan Methodist Churches, and similar projects are before other Christian bodies.

In view of what has been accomplished in the way of organic union—and it is a long and notable list—and in view of propositions for consolidation of other bodies which are being seriously considered, it does not after all seem impossible that the dream, as some call it, which was dreamed the other day in Philadelphia may be realized.

Will the Church Pay the Price?

EVERY year, in spite of the continued separation and the frequent accusation in the insinuating question "Is Christianity a failure?" the world is learning to respect more and more the word "Christian," and to speculate upon the relation between Christianity and religion as the churches dispense it. What but this steady Christian growth a heart-hunger for self-manifestation has created and nurtured the appalling number of religious sects we see today? We must admit that not materialism but spiritual hunger has been the foundation. Has any sect, any creed, any dogma proven sufficient unto the cravings of man?

Our boys in the trenches have told us how, as never before in their lives, they have come heart to heart and voice to voice with Christ. Not "We believe so and so; what's your church belief?" The millstone of creed has been thrown off, and the Christ that was hidden has been experienced; the vital breath, the personal communion and fellowship with Christ.

When our boys return the churches will greedily and clamorously reach for them—the former members and the new members ready to come into the fold. Unless a change is made, each will be branded with the hot iron of creed. He will be compelled, as an honest man among men, to say "I believe in this or that method of baptism; I believe in such and such method of communion." Rather than chafe under such harness he will silently and alone "believe in Christ," his new-found Companion.

The all-burning question is not his suffering. But will he alone, and battling against the cross of that creed that shut him out from those who perhaps were less vital, less loyal Christians—will he stand? Will his reach be long enough and strong enough to hold on? Has the war been long enough to strengthen that reach? Will the churches and the ministers throw off the yoke of creed—man-made creeds—and say "Not Wesley, not Knox, not popes, not Calvin—not Methodism, Baptistism, Catholicism or any 'ism,' but Christ is the belief"? Will the proud churches say "Come to our Old Brick Church, our Fifth Avenue Church, our little James Street Church. Come and believe in Christ"? Can the autocracy of creed be crushed as has the autocracy of Germany?

There is one way for unity after the war. But it remains for the churches to blast away the barriers from that way. With Dr. John McInnis, I say, "Will the Church pay the price?"

The War's Vindication of the Word

*A SERMON BY REV. JOHN ROACH STRATON, D.D.

TEXT—John 17 : 17. "Sanctify them in the truth; thy Word is truth."

THE World War has brought to the fore striking illustrations of the truth of Bible doctrines as usually interpreted by what is called the old theology. Glance for a moment at some of the old Bible truths that the war has illustrated and vindicated.

Take, for example, the fall of man as recounted in Genesis. Some have had difficulty with this fundamental doctrine of the Bible. I was talking a short time ago with a brilliant young college man, steeped in the scientific skepticism of the age, and he said:

"But, Doctor, think how irrational is the theory that man fell in a garden, just created by an all-wise and all-powerful God!"

I replied by pointing out the very interesting fact that modern Germany also fell in a garden. There was not a country upon the earth more blessed and prosperous than Germany. Her progress in all lines, except morals and spirituality, had been marvelous. If she had remained true to right ideals she would have gone on undoubtedly into the leadership of the whole earth. But even in that garden of prosperity and peace the devil of selfishness, untruth and false ambition entered, and the ruling classes fell, and, like the fall in Eden, carried down the innocent multitudes with them.

THE war's conditions have also vindicated the Bible truth of predictive prophecy. I give but one illustration of this. In a remarkable article in Harper's Magazine for September on "The Soul of Fighting France," Nina Duryea, the head of the Duryea War Relief in Europe, in the course of many touching illustrations of the revival of faith and the intervention of supernatural forces in the war, tells of the case of a Frenchwoman who had suffered so terribly that her mind was partly unbalanced. She says: "In the evacuated region one heard of a woman of education who, eight months before America declared war, had lost her mind from too much suffering. It was said she possessed the gift of prophecy. One evening this distraught creature appeared in our garden, where 'kultur' had cut down trees, uprooted currant and rose bushes, and polluted the well. The woman wandered to and fro unmolested, as though searching for something, until she reached an American soldier who had neither moved nor spoken. Becoming aware of his presence, she asked:

" 'Who are you?'

"He saluted and replied, 'An American soldier fighting for France.'

" 'Perhaps you can help me,' she said. 'I had four sons. One lies beneath the snows of the Vosges; one rots on the bed of the sea; one fell from heaven, I know not where, and one—lay here, on my breast, soft and warm and—mine. But strange men came with spikes on their heads. There were great noises raging and cruel happenings. At last there was a vast noise and blackness. When it passed I saw my baby lying in pieces. Those men kicked the pieces and laughed and then put them in a box and took them away. Can you tell me where they are?' "

Without waiting for a reply, the woman walked on, peering about for that box which held the baby she had loved. Again she approached the soldier, and as though for the first time she said, "Who are you?" and again he made the same reply. Then a dawning comprehension seemed to pierce her brain, and she touched his sleeve and groped over the national insignia of his rank, as she reiterated the word "America!" Then she stepped backward and with upraised arms burst into a sort of Biblical rhapsody:

"A great host shall come in numbers like the stars of heaven. The sea shall bear them. Justice shall be upon their banners and Liberty shall be their cry. Their tread shall shake the fortresses of the proud. The great king shall hide his face in fear and shall seek for safety and find none, for the curses of his people shall rise like flames about him, and he shall walk in the blood of his children. Hasten the coming of that mighty host, O Lord God! Make clear their way. Let the shining presence of our glorious dead be about them, for they shall bring peace!"

She moved away, searching for her dead baby. It is to be remembered, says Miss Duryea, that "she could have had no knowledge of America's entry into the war."

WHAT a remarkable incident this is in the light of the war's close and the events which followed it! We can more readily believe in the reality of Biblical prophecy in the light of such instances.

The war has brought home to us as nothing else could have done the fact of sin and the guilt of sin. The easy-going notion that sin is simply "misdirected energy" or results from lack of evolutionary development, etc., etc.—all such ideas as these have been completely exploded by the war. We have seen sin again in all of its ugliness and its essential ill-desert. Who can stand in the presence of such horrors and infamies as have occurred in Armenia and Serbia and Russia and Belgium and France and any longer soften the fact of human sin?

Oh, how God has humbled our egotism and our pride, and how he has exploded the silly notion that we were "evolving" into a man-made Paradise! Instead of that the world was really moving for the past fifty years toward a hell of infamy and woe. Let some of the soft-pedal new theology brethren kindly rise and testify, in the light of these things!

Notice again the world-wide and insistent demand for the adequate punishment of Germany because of her sins. Many of the pulpits of the land have a weak and mushy theology, but it is very noticeable now that the newspapers of the world are all preaching a thoroughly sound theology. The papers are clamoring that justice be meted out to Germany. They all recognize that justice is punitive and retributive as well as preventive and exemplary in its action. They all recognize that there is a vast difference between heartless vengeance and righteous retribution for hideous wrong. Some of the very editors who a few years ago were laughing at those who preached an old-fashioned hell are now believing that hell is not hot enough for the Kaiser and his Junker satellites. In this connection, too, it is to be noticed that we are not having so much difficulty as formerly with the "imprecatory Psalms," as we call down upon Germany the just wrath of a holy God.

NOTICE, too, the demand for a genuine repentance on the part of Germany. Why, even some of the new theology brethren are fairly bristling with the proposition that Germany shall not even be allowed to come to the "mourner's bench" until she has "brought forth fruits meet unto repentance." Our correspondents in Europe are warning us that there has been no real change of heart in Germany, and we are watching with grave faces to see some indication that the sinner has really repented.

We are also watching for signs of true faith in the higher and nobler things of life, and here again the idea of the old theology of salvation by faith through grace is vindicated.

We are not having so much trouble, either, over the truth of vicarious atonement in these latter days. The very brethren who shouted loudest that they were "tired of a bloody Gospel" have been the most clamorous in their demands for unflinching support of the war "to make the world safe for democracy." As we have seen our noble boys pouring out their rich young blood in the mud and snow of Flanders and France, that liberty might live and righteousness reign, we have been a little more willing to look at the crucified Son of God as he poured out his precious blood, that sinners might live and righteousness might reign. Oh that we may all come to see that every good thing which we enjoy is bought by some one else for us, and the salvation, therefore, of our immortal souls could only be purchased by that which was precious and valuable, even the shed blood of Calvary! How humble we should be today and how grateful as we bow again at the foot of the cross!

SO WE could go ahead tracing out the whole scheme of Christian doctrine, and at every point we behold a vindication in actual life of the plain, old-fashioned teachings of the Word of God. Its right to speak as an authority has been vindicated in this supreme event of all history, the Great War. These things should lead us to humble ourselves unto the mighty hand of God, and to turn away from our self-sufficiency and pride of intellect and our dreams of a man-made perfect society. With the object-lesson of modern Germany before us, we may as well be done with the dream of an ideal state that has been brought about by human "evolution." We cannot build a good society out of bad men, any more than we could build a good house out of bad boards. We need the old-fashioned Bible truth of regeneration as the foundation of all our thinking, and we need, above all things, loyalty to the revealed Word of God.

We hear in some quarters today the sophistical saying that it "does not make any difference what a man believes, just so he does good and acts right." We might as well say that it does not make any difference if a man stops eating, just so he continues to live and work; or that it makes no difference if we have no backbone, just so we continue to stand and walk about! How the devil is seeking to delude the world with these silly, man-made watch-cries! We imagined that it made no difference what Germany believed; but see what happened to her and to the world when she changed her belief and was led off after false gods!

The "Nineteens" of the Bible

By REV. CHARLES H. YATMAN

THE next twelve months will write as many "nineteens" as sands on the seashore, for the New Year is a double of that number. It's rather queer that Jew and pagan, Christian and infidel alike, consciously or unconsciously, have to put Jesus in every letter or paper they date. While "eleven" is the outstanding figure of the present—for it was that hour and that date of the eleventh month that set the world shouting, as it had never done before, over the close of the war—yet in the years to come there will have to be added the double nineteen to know the year when the Peace Treaty was signed.

Millions may not know it or will not admit it, but the fact is, the teachings of the Scriptures—the Christian Bible—is the bottom source of power that set the world fighting for Democracy against a pervert who tried to make himself, his people and all other folk believe a lie.

There are many "nineteens" in the Bible that are stars of the first magnitude. What prayer can the multitude make every morning of the New Year that is better than the closing verse of the Nineteenth Psalm?—"Let the words of my mouth and the meditations of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer."

No individual or nation ever lived by the laws of God as found in the nineteenth chapter of Deuteronomy without being blessed above measure. America is what she is, and has done what she has, because these principles are found in our blood. The difference between Germany and the United States is that she let the devil drive these tremendous truths out, while we let God drive them in.

The greatest tragedy that ever happened is fully told in the Gospel by John, chapter nineteen. Revelation Nineteen is the Marriage Supper chapter and is a feast of expectation.

For people who have gone hungry this year because of war, or that others might be fed, there is no better New Year's text than the nineteenth verse of the first chapter of Isaiah. No food profiteers can keep meal, meat or milk from the class who live up to the conditions named there.

Soldier boys home from the battlefields in France will find most everything tame for a while. To help bridge over the chasm to normal life, let them read the nineteenth chapter of Acts. Action enough there! It stirs the blood to read it. The whole chapter would make a fine magazine article for present-day people who are looking for "pep" in their reading. The Bible reader who follows Paul in his missionary journeys will pause here while he watches the great apostle initiate the infant church at Ephesus into the deeper truths of the faith and withstand the riotous Ephesian silversmiths.

The church has dedicated one of her most solemn feast days in memory of the Triumphal Entry of our Lord into Jerusalem—related in Luke 19.

A journey through Matthew nineteen is better than a trip to Europe, with surpassing sights, strange doings, and entrancing events. Besides, there will be no seasickness and no tips; no lost luggage and no lost tempers.

The greatest solo of all music in history is the one from the Oratorio of the Messiah: "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and this comes from the nineteenth chapter of the Book of Job.

The Eyes of the Lord

SUNDAY, January 12. I Sam. 16 : 7. "The Lord seeth not as man seeth." The Lord looks upon the heart and he sees the hidden fault. But he also sees the precious things which he puts among his jewels. A poor widow drops a coin into the treasury and human observers see only a mite. But the Lord looks upon the heart, and he sees untold millions in the gift. All the movements of the soul are known unto him. He sees the desire that has never yet found fulfilment. He sees the hidden heartache which never hangs a black flag out to the window. He sees the prayer before it has uttered itself in words. He sees the love which has no adequate means of expression. The Lord sits over against the heart and he knows every silent stealthy thing that moves across its floors. He knew what was in man.

And here is another hint about the eyes of the Lord: "As the heavens are high above the earth, so are my thoughts higher than your thoughts." It is the captain's view of things at sea which is so different from the landman passengers. The captain can interpret the heavens. He knows the path across the trackless sea; the big waves have no terror in their approach; the night shineth even as the day. The landman is the victim of immediate discomfort. He cannot read the language of the skies. He sees things out of proportions. The breeze is a squall, and the rolling is a tragedy. And so it is in the affairs of life. We are landmen on the sea. The Captain sees with "larger other eyes than ours." Our great Captain plants his footsteps in the sea and rides upon the storm.

And I would mention a third hint about the eyes of the Lord. He sees the end from the beginning. We are slaves of the incident, he is Master of the process. We are limited to the immediate link, he sees the finished chain. We feel only the fierceness of the fire, he sits at the fire as the refiner of silver and he sees the shining issues. We see tears and blood and tragedy; he looks beyond the travail and he sees the new creation. J. H. J.

The Father's Far-Sight

MONDAY, January 13. Luke 15 : 20. "But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him." Love is always keen-sighted. A mother sees promise in her boy which no teacher ever discovered. If we are permitted to go to the docks when the ships come in which bear our surviving soldiers home, it will not be difficult for any mother to pick out her son on the deck long before the transport warps into the slip and throws out its gangplanks. "There he is now; don't you see him? He is the handsome, brave-looking boy with brown hair." Ah, a mother can see her son when he is still a great way off. So can a father, and if the boy's mother is dead, as the prodigal son's mother probably was, then the father sees for two.

The prodigal's father was waiting and watching. Hope deferred had often made his heart sick, but it had never made his eyes dim. As we grow old, we generally acquire far-sight. We need glasses to read with, but the far horizon, the distant landscape—our eyes have adjusted themselves to that. We are moving toward "the land of far distances" and our eyes are growing accustomed to the perspective. Love is more than far-sight; it is insight. Infinite love sees more in humanity than the most optimistic humanist ever saw. Are these qualities not in us? Of course they are! We never see people as they are until we love them. God sees in us what our best friends fail to see: nobilities, sanctities, capacities, of which we ourselves have never dreamed. Jesus renamed Peter "a rock" while he was yet soft as putty. But he was not putty; he was clay, and in the furious fires of trial he became like rock. The Master surprised Nathanael by saying, "When thou wast under the fig-tree I saw thee." He saw a prospective disciple when he was yet a great way off. To every one of us who is a great way off from the Father, God sends the Elder Brother to hasten our steps lest the night fall and find us exiles from his heart and house.

The Supreme Joy

TUESDAY, January 14. Luke 10 : 20. "Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rather rejoice, because your names are written in heaven." From minor joys Jesus leads his followers to the supreme joy. He had not begrudged them the sincere gladness with which they had come to make their glowing reports to him of the blessed effects of their ministry; nor had he depreciated what they had accomplished. But it is never good for our spiritual well-being to rejoice too much over anything we have achieved. We may in the first glow of our enthusiasm be entirely forgetful of self in telling what we were enabled to do for the kingdom of God. We may give all the glory to God and his grace alone. But before we know it the old spirit of self-seeking and pride has insinuated itself into our pure feeling of satisfaction over the good that has been accomplished, and then, like the Pharisees of old, we have had our reward. Besides, these moments of joy over the advancement of the interests of the kingdom in our own hearts and among others are not always. Alas! they are so few and far between. And they do not last, as a rule. New conflicts arise while we are still in prayer celebrating our triumphs, with conflict comes disappointment.

The great things which professing disciples of Jesus do abroad is no certain criterion of their own inward and spiritual condition. We remember the words which Jesus spoke at the conclusion of the Sermon on the Mount to some who claimed that in his name they had cast out devils and done many wonderful works: he declared that he would in spite of all have to say to them: "I never knew you." "Even the greatest talents and gifts cannot be compared with the prerogative of him who obtains in heaven a place of honor." That is the supreme joy upon which we should feast our hearts amid the imperfections of our present state. Our own deliverance from the powers of evil, the final salvation of our own soul, must remain the matter of chief concern to every one of us while we are laboring for the kingdom of Christ and his righteousness. Here is cause for unalloyed joy and happiness: Heaven is mine! My Saviour says so, and that is guarantee enough. God has in mercy inscribed my name in the Book of Life.

The Forty Days' Trial

WEDNESDAY, January 15. Mark 1 : 13. "And he was in the wilderness forty days, tempted of Satan." At our Lord's baptism, the Father testified, saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." The devil, as in Eden, cast a cloud of doubt over the divine Father's words, saying, "If thou be the Son of God," as though there was uncertainty about the fact. Does not Satan say the same to us? "If you have been converted," introducing a doubt that might lead to despair. Again he whispers to the believing soul, "If Jesus is the divine Saviour, examine with me his claims. I can show you that he is only one of the best of humans." How subtle, how snake-like his insinuations!

Satan appears as an angel of light to Jesus, saying, "Make these stones bread; you are hungry." He asks him to do a right thing in a wrong way, to follow the tempter instead of the will of God. Every time Christ answered him with the words of Holy Scripture, "Man shall not live by bread alone but by every word of God." In the next temptation the devil quotes the Bible, "He shall give his angels charge concerning thee." But Jesus matched him with the words, "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." At last Satan offered him an easier way than Calvary to win the world to himself by worshiping the evil one, which would be following Satan's example when he rebelled in heaven. Christ replied, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." Our Lord knew that Satan's rule was temporary, while he would reign King Eternal.

Jesus went forth from the forty days' trial, from the desert loneliness and the wild beasts of passion, victorious over all evil. He was conscious that legions of angels were waiting to comfort and defend him. How beautiful to know that we may come forth from supreme trials more than conqueror, attended by a retinue of angels! Life and the Love of God

THURSDAY, January 16. Rom. 8 : 38, 39. "Nor life . . . shall separate us from the love of God." Life is a greater thing than many think. Its complexities are more intricate and its dilemmas more bewildering than most young people suppose. "How terrible is life!" exclaimed a woman who had lived a sheltered life until her marriage, but who found that gentle breeding is no insurance against the bitterest of woe. Yes, life is terrible; but its chief element of terror is in the possibility that it may bring us experiences which seem to shut the door in our faces, the door which, closing, separates us from the love and care of God. Then there is life's loneliness. There is the loneliness of souls that are not understood, of souls that are fighting unknown foes; and of souls that confront problems which they can not share with others. But such experiences need not shut out God; they may shut the soul in with God.

Life's dilemmas, its problems that vex the intellect, burden the heart and oppress the spirit, may possibly separate us from the love of God. And yet, is life indeed so complicated? Is not our path clear in all ordinary cases? With reference to absolute right and wrong, we cannot long be in doubt as to our duty. With reference to courses which are right, when choice must be made, we need not be in doubt as to duty, since it is clearly God's will that the holier course, the more beautiful course, ordinarily the more difficult course, is the one for us to pursue. Duty and Goodness are the angels of the covenant which bind the trustful heart to God, and nothing can defeat them, or impede their progress straight to the heart of him that sitteth upon the throne. If duty is clear, we must give ourselves to it unconditionally. If goodness is regnant in the universe we must achieve it by the grace of God. C. C. A.

Revealed Unto Babes

FRIDAY, January 17. Luke 10 : 21. "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes: even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight." An hour of joy had come in the life of Jesus when he saw his disciples safely returned to him from their first missionary journey and listened to their glad accounts. He had somewhat checked their outbursts of joy by his preceding remarks, because he knew their weakness, as he knows the weaknesses of every one of us. But he did not detract from the glory of their work: he rather carried it in prayer to the Father and blessed him for carrying out his eternal counsels of mercy through such humble instruments.

"Babes" he calls them, and such they were in comparison with the great leaders in the Church who had arrayed themselves against him and his ministry of redemption. The simple truths which they had preached, saying, "Repent and believe the Gospel; for the kingdom of God is come!" had caused a religious awakening such as Judea had never witnessed, and such as the elaborate wisdom of her theologians and the gorgeous services of her priests could not have brought about. Was it not strange? God had verily magnified the greatness of his doings by the insignificance of the tools with which he wrought them.

And Jesus rejoiced as he surveyed the outworking of this divine plan. All believers rejoice with him; for these events that happened two thousand years ago are but the pattern and presage of what was to happen in all the centuries after. So does our heavenly Father in our own time: if the wise will not heed his word, he finds ready acceptance for it among the simple. If the great ones scorn his mercy, the lowly treasure it up as the pearl of great price.

Christ's Witnesses

SATURDAY, January 18. Acts 1 : 8. "Ye shall be my witnesses unto the uttermost parts of the earth." Paul said, "I know whom I have believed." Faith so brings Christ into the heart that the soul knows his glorious presence as a fact of experience. No one can testify beyond his knowledge or experimental consciousness. "Have you received the Holy Ghost since ye believed?" If not, you cannot speak of his fulness with power, for we cannot call Jesus Lord except by the Holy Spirit. He is the great Revealer. When we know him and the power of his resurrection, we will be willing to die for him, live for him and witness for him. The joy of the Lord disperses all the clouds of doubt. The peace of Christ, like a river, bears the soul upon its bosom toward the ocean of infinite love and rest. The divine Spirit makes Christ a power so real in the manhood that we long "to publish to the sons of men the signs infallible."

Paul was to witness to all men what he had seen and heard when he was arrested in his persecuting career and converted to Christ. This he did on every great occasion of his missionary life. His greatest sermons contained his experience when God the Father revealed his Son in his heart. The beloved John was instructed to write the wonderful revelations made to him on the lonely isle of Patmos. All the apostles were commanded to tell the story of their conversion and Pentecostal baptism. For witnesses are needed more than pleaders; telling what the Lord God has done for your soul is what the world is hungry to hear. David's stories of his soul trials and victories, put in the form of sacred song, have filled the world with the melody of pardon and the music of salvation. E. W. C.

Copyright, 1919, by Charles M. Sheldon

TWO days later Mrs. Ward and Requa went over and secured suitable rooms in the town. Requa, with a fortitude that amazed Mrs. Ward, calmly laid out a campaign of regular study for herself.

"Dick is preparing himself to go to Palestine or Syria. I am going to read up on the country and the people and keep posted on all movements over there. I must do something regular or I'll go insane up here. Dick and I will write often and—I'll live and work for him—and for Daddy—"

She gave Mrs. Ward every assurance of her serious purpose, and when Dick received the account on his mother's return he felt almost hopeful of some happy future for himself as he resolutely set himself to the task of preparation for his missionary service.

And the task to which Dick now gave himself up with all the earnestness born of intense human sorrow and inward obedience to his divine call was a task worthy of the best and greatest powers he possessed. What was true of him was true of all the others who had made their definite choice to go into all the world for its redemption.

They were astonished, these heroes of the battle-fields of Europe, to find that the work of redeeming the world called for as much skill, as much genius, as much energy and power, as the work of organizing armies and planning military campaigns. Once started on a study of their respective fields of service at the American Missionary College, they never ceased to exclaim over the boundless sweep of the Commission. It called for physical endurance equal to the soldier's at his best, for a knowledge of history, language, agriculture, music, sciences, and a depth of religious fervor and spiritual faith and love of mankind that taxed to its fullest capacity their bodies, souls and intellects.

ONE day Bert said after a preliminary outline of Mexico's missionary campaign had been sent him by the College Department,

"I don't believe I can get into this draft, Esther, the requirements are too many. I can't measure up to them. In order to be a missionary to Mexico I ought to be a statesman, a diplomat, a linguist, a surgeon and physician, an agriculturist, an editor, a financier, and a full-grown saint."

"That is because a missionary is really the biggest person in all the world, because making disciples of all the nations is the biggest business ever committed to humans," said Esther. "There is this thought to encourage us. We shall probably know a good deal more than the people to whom we go."

"Well, I'm ready to start any time I'm reasonably fit. And I somehow have the feeling that we shall find Alamero's family. Wouldn't it be a great adventure if we should?"

"If we don't find his family we shall find many others just as needy," Esther replied, and with boundless enthusiasm, much of which she imparted to the slower-minded Bert, the girl plunged into daily study of the Great Commission and its meaning.

Time flies fast in work and in doing the Master's bidding. Dr. Ward was astounded as the days swept along and new recruits were constantly added to the list of those who wanted to enlist in this army. These newcomers were not the result of any special efforts on his own part, but seemed to be the outcome of a wave of missionary passion sweeping through the churches. Hunter telegraphed from a small town where he had gone on his crusade of federating churches:

"Seventy-five young men and women enlisted here last night at close of our meeting, ready to take oath of allegiance to the Master and go into all the world. Some of them already members Students' Volunteer Band. Churches here unite in federation like the one at Waterbury, Vt., where the Methodist and Congregational churches have federated. Wonderful experiences. The movement for federation is gathering power."

THIS was only a modest hint of the real facts. Chaplain Hunter was moving through the states in a crusade which was marked by intense spiritual reality. His name and his purpose were known all over America. The response to his glowing appeal for federation was seemingly miraculous. Town after town called for him to come and unite the divided forces of denominationalism. Midweek services for mutual conference, prayer and consecration were held in hundreds of towns in every state. The problem of the Sunday night church service was being solved, not by special individual efforts to attract audiences, but by a real union of four or five or eight or ten different churches coming together.

A new and refreshing phase of Christianity was being created by Hunter and his fiery but sensible consecration, and the denominations were making a new chapter in the history of the Church.

A few weeks after the tragedy of Rufus Randall and his consignment to the federal prison, Esther and Bert were married at the parsonage and went direct to the American Missionary College to prepare themselves for their mission to Mexico. Richard followed a month later with a group from the old Ambulance Company.

Dr. Ward was musing over this list one Sunday night after his services were over. Mrs. Ward was with him in the study.

"It's marvelous, Sarah, when you stop to think of it—this thing. More bewildering than the call to the colors that came suddenly in 1917. Think of this—Robert Underwood going to North China; Connie Clayton to Bulgaria; George Ryder to Turkey; Wallace Holmes to South America; Roger Blake to Italy; Clarence Wood to West Africa; his brother Will to South China; and our own Bert to Mexico. I have to rub my eyes, especially when I think of Dick going off alone to Palestine. It took more courage for the lad to answer this call than the other."

"I don't understand. He left us with a smile each time. And to think of Requa up there with her father! Dick surely is a wonder," Mrs. Ward said as she wiped away a tear. "I don't see how we could stand all this being alone, John, if these young folks didn't shame us with their heroism."

"Randall may linger on for a long time," Dr. Ward said. "Requa writes that he is apparently resigned to his fate and is well enough to do some clerical work in the prison office. And Dick never questioned Requa's duty to her father."

"But if her father should pass away there soon, she will certainly join Dick."

"No doubt of that," replied Dr. Ward cheerfully. "And it is that thought that gives Dick hope. But there's the bell. I'll answer it."

HE WENT to the door and returned with Archie Nelson, who had been one of the heroes at Chateau Thierry. Nelson had no home when he enlisted and was settling down in Bradford as an expert electrician, specially skilled in battery work. He was not married and did not seem to care for a home. An odd genius, clean-minded, generous, a lover of little children, he had adopted two French orphan lads and had sent for them to come and live with him, but during decisions of his comrades to go into all the world he had made no sign that he was specially interested in the radical step the other boys were taking.

He seemed embarrassed as Dr. Ward ushered him into the study. Mrs. Ward rose to go out.

"Won't you stay, Mrs. Ward? I want your advice, too, as well as Dr. Ward's."

Mrs. Ward sat down and Nelson looked and acted nervous, as if not quite certain how what he had to say would be received.

"I've felt ever since the fellows went away to the missionary training camp as if I was a slacker, Dr. Ward, and I can't rest until I get your O. K. on my plan. As I understand it, your phrase 'all the world' covers every spot on the globe, doesn't it?"

"By all means. Not a spot left out."

"Then Bradford is a part of 'all the world'?"

"It certainly is. Where else could it be?"

"Then if I enlist in the draft to serve here in Bradford, can I be counted in with Dick and Bert and Underwood and the rest?"

Archie spoke so wistfully that Dr. Ward, looking at him and remembering his heroic record "over there," was near to tears.

"My dear fellow, that is just what the great Commission means. We can't all go to Palestine or India or Turkey. If you can make disciples anywhere you are called to the colors anywhere."

"That was in my mind," Archie said with a sigh of relief. "You see, I know my limitations and I know I could never make good in a mission field. But I've noticed since I began my work down around the shops a raft of boys running the streets. Many of 'em lost their daddies or their big brothers in the war, and they've been neglected, and—I wondered—if I might 'carry on' as a scoutmaster in Bradford. There's no Boy Scouts organization here, and I would be able to give my whole time outside the shop to the boys, and maybe that would be counted a sort of missionary service, and I would get some honorable mention as belonging to the other volunteers."

MRS. WARD anticipated her husband.

"There! The dream of my thought is coming true! Mr. Nelson, I have tried to get a dozen different men in Bradford to organize the Boy Scouts. Different ones have tried and failed. It's not the fault of the boys, but no leader has been found. You are just the one. Why didn't we think of you sooner!"

Dr. Ward went over and shook Nelson's hand, and then in his excitement he paced up and down the little strip of worn rug that ran like a path by his desk.

"Nelson, all this makes me think of an incident that happened years ago in South Dakota. I was in a home missionary church there, and it was receiving aid from a home missionary society. A seminary classmate of mine had gone to Central Turkey as a missionary and had built up a self-supporting church. He trained his people to give their money to all good causes, and among others he had a Foreign Missionary Society. Somehow he heard of my struggling little home missionary church on the Dakota frontier and told his people of our need, and what did they do but take up a foreign missionary offering for my church in Dakota!

"So you see what is home missionary work in one part of the world is foreign work in another. Bradford is foreign missionary ground to the people in Palestine. You are just as much going into 'all the world' if you evangelize those boys here, as if you went to Jerusalem or Peking."

Nelson went out of that conference with a fiery enthusiasm to "do his bit" in Bradford. His example was contagious. He secured the enthusiastic help of business men and other members of Ambulance 241 to clean up Bradford and make it truly missionary ground. And it is part of the history of the whole wonderful movement that swept the country that the scoutmaster of Bradford was instrumental in reaching with Christian influence in real evangelization nearly every neglected boy in the town.

AS THE time sped on, Dr. and Mrs. Ward were thrilled by the news that came into the little study from the ends of the earth. The one thing that kept their hearts young and preserved them from intolerable loneliness was these messages telling of the triumphs of the Cross in the lands where it was borne by the men and women who were pouring in a constantly increasing army out of America into all the world.

Esther and Bert had finished their special course of preparation in the American College within a year and a half. And almost before it seemed possible letters were coming into the parsonage study from Sonora, the western province on the Gulf of California.

"We are at Sahuaripa, about one hundred miles east of Hermosillo. Up in the mountains. Wonderful opportunities."

A few months later:

"We have been transferred to Alamos, south of the River Mayo. Thanks to the generous provision made for this station, the handsome and commodious church and school buildings have already been erected. Our second Sunday at Alamos we had a crowd of three thousand present. We are overwhelmed with the prospect. These people are hungering for the Gospel. We already have an enrolment of nine hundred in our Bible school. The church will seat twenty-five hundred, but it is not big enough. Next week Bert" (Esther was writing) "is going up into the mountains as far as Baroyeca. He thinks there is actually a possibility that Alamero's children are there, from inquiries he has made. It is astonishing how well he talks the language, and the Yaquis almost worship him. He is a most wonderful man, my husband is, and I am in love with him more and more every day. I never dreamed of such happiness, and we both wonder how any one except missionaries can be perfectly happy."

ALMOST in this same mail came a long letter from Underwood from North China, only a part of which is here given. Underwood and his wife, a Smith College girl who had served in the French Building during the war, were tremendously enthusiastic over their work at Tingchou and Paotingfu. They wrote: "There are so many seeking instruction that we are utterly unable to meet the demands. They say that so many desire to enter the church that they haven't time to take down the names. Literally hundreds of villages there have been affected. The men showed me the map of the district, with the various villages where there are Christians, marked with a red circle, and it seemed as if almost every village in the hsien had some inquirers. Not only so, but in the city of Tingchou itself, as a result of this religious movement, the gentry have built a large, commodious building, which they dedicated to reform and moral instruction. Another building is an educational bureau center. Both these places are the outgrowth of the religious movement there during the past year. The gentry and the students of the schools are regular attendants at the services.

"We must not weary you with many, many details, and yet we desire to so present it that you pray very earnestly for the Paotingfu field. Pastor Li, of Peking, and three other men, one from Tientsin, one from Tunghsien, and one from our own Paotingfu, have been making an evangelistic tour of this field. They say they never have seen anything like it; that there is nothing like it in North China, and they favor calling men from other fields and putting them into this field, in order to conserve results."

AT THE very time Dr. and Mrs. Ward were reading these letters and feeling stirred to the depths by them, on the edge of the village of Nazareth there emerged from an irrigating ditch down on the southwest slope of the hill a figure that recalled the old mud-covered days in France.

It was Dick Ward, and his stout engineering suit was plastered with the thick clay of the ditch which he had been measuring to get its proper angle. Busy figures of men dotted the hillside. Modern machinery was working on all sides. A wonderful spring had been discovered under the slope, and the American Relief had been using Dick's skill in a part of its development, and as he himself had said, "I did not come out here to stand up under a palm tree and preach long sermons to the natives, clad in a black suit and a white tie. If this water will grow more wheat and make more bread for children in the Esdraelon Valley, I guess it's missionary work all right."

He sat down on a concrete base and fell to musing on the great Life that once lived up there in that little town, now being modernized with electric light and sanitation and health-contained buildings. An electric engine with trolley cars quietly swung around the base of the hill.

He was so used to the sight that he did not feel the amazement older men might who had seen Palestine under Turkish misrule. But the whole thing, including the meaning of all the busy scene around him, did have its impression. It was good to live in the midst of it and be a part of the actual restoration of the promised land to God's people.

Some one called his name, and he came back to his immediate surroundings as one of the engineers came up with a cablegram.

"Burke asked me to bring it over. Just came in from the wireless."

Dick quickly opened with a prayer that it might not be bad news of illness at home, and stood there, his hat off, the setting sun falling over his still boyish face.

"Father passed away last night. Your father was with me. I am coming out with next company of Red Cross nurses and missionaries. REQUA."

Dick's lips touched the little slip of paper. Then he went up the hill to a quiet spot and kneeled. The sunshine was just falling behind the shadow. But it was summer in his heart as he kneeled there, maybe very close to the spot where his Master used to go at twilight to commune with his heavenly Father.

westward to the Hudson, the men re-embarking there for the ships.

At 7 P. M. the long lines of warships were illuminated for the first time since April, 1917.

When the wireless message was received from Admiral Mayo on Christmas day, telling the commanders of the hips in port that the squadron would anchor off the Ambrose Channel lighthip about 3 P. M., the destroyer Ringgold, a 35-knot submarine terror, started rom the naval anchorage at 79th Street with huge bags of Christmas mail for the men on board the fleet. As the ships ame to anchor, the Ringgold steamed longside and the men cheered her with ood will because she brought them the oliday spirit in letters and packages rom the folks at home.

AFTER the parade, Admiral Hugh Rodman, in an interview, told the tory of the part played by America's hips in the final chapters of the war. He told how our navy, ready for war he minute it was declared, had romptly taken its part in the great vents, a flotilla of torpedo boats going ver at once, followed later by the quadron of battleships, which became he Sixth Battle Squadron of the Grand leet—the power that sought to make he sea safe and free for Allied ships nd to deny it to the enemy. He paid a arm tribute to Admiral Sir David Beatty as "a man of rare accomplishments, a natural born, tried, trusted and allant leader." To work homogeneusly, Admiral Rodman said, the Americans adopted the British signals nd methods of communication, plans, policies, maneuvers and tactics, and mmediately took up their share of the ork, patrol, convoying, search or ming. The American Squadron formed ne of the two fast wings of the Grand leet, placing it either at the head or he rear in column. At one time when was at the head, the German High eas Fleet was almost cut off from its ase.

All sorts of ruses were adopted to raw the Germans out, but they proved tile. The foe was too wary.

The Admiral said his flag-ship, the ew York, had been rammed once by a ubmarine, which dented her plates and re away the starboard propeller, the ubmarine probably being sunk by the ows she received from the propeller ades. While en route to dry dock for repair, the New York escaped two torpedoes only by skillful maneuvering; and again, off the coast of Norway, she avoided six torpedoes.

Describing the conditions under which the fleet worked, Admiral Rodman said: "It would be superfluous to go into details of our operations in the North Sea; or to mention the rigorous climate, when the latitude is north of Sitka in Alaska, or the terrific weather, the cold, sleet, snow, ice, and heavy seas; the arduous and dangerous navigation; the continuous cruising in close formation at high speed without lights, where the winter nights lasted eighteen hours. Or the dangers from mine fields, our own sometimes, as well as those of the enemy; or the repeated attacks on our battleships of hostile submarines; and the never-ending vigilance and the readiness of the whole fleet to put to sea on instant notice.

"Let it be sufficient to say that during our absence of a year, there was no other condition than that of constant and continuous readiness for action. There was no liberty or leave worth mentioning. All ships were completely closed and darkened from sunset to sunrise, in winter this meant from fifteen to eighteen hours. This, in all but an arctic climate. But there was no complaint; on the other hand, every one seemed happy and contented, and all were eager to go to sea every time the occasion demanded, in the hope that we would meet the Hun fleet and engage it."

Admiral Rodman said that the Grand fleet, steaming in column with destroyers, was on an average sixty-five miles long. He told briefly of the surrender of the German High Seas Fleet. British orders directed the removal of the breech-blocks of all guns, the war-heads of torpedoes and the cutting of the fire control apparatus on the German ships which were then ordered, with reduced crews, to proceed to the place of surrender. A British light cruiser met the German column and guided it through the lines of the Grand Fleet, every ship's crew of which was in readiness to give possible treachery its proper reward. As the fleet neared harbor, Admiral Beatty signalled to the Germans, "At sundown, lower your colors and do not hoist them again without permission." "Surely," said Admiral Rodman, "no greater humiliation could have befallen them, after their frequent and taunting boasts and threats."

Have you tried this on Rugs?

This treatment makes rag rugs, strips of carpet, doormats, fresh and bright. Free articles from dust. Dissolve a tablespoonful of Gold Dust in half a pail of hot water. Dip a clean broom in this gentle, soapy water, and whisk briskly over the surface. Brush with clear water. Hang to dry. Gold Dust leaves no undissolved particles to stick to fibre or weave, and gently dissolves dirt and grease.

The Passover

International Sunday School Lesson for January 19
Ex. 11 : 1 to 12 : 36

The Value of Religious Festivals

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

SEVERAL of our modern Hebrew writers have told us of the deep impression made upon their youthful minds by the Feast of the Passover. It is a beautiful example of an acted story, a real tableau, through which for ages Jewish children have learned in a vivid way of the ancient deliverance of their people. Things seen are more likely to be remembered than things heard. But to see and hear and participate in a ceremony like this is unforgetable. It really would be memorable for one of the Sunday school classes to act it out, before the teaching of the lesson at all. Not long ago I saw a thousand men of a great Christian fraternity participate in this rite, and the memory is imperishable.

It is only occasionally that we have a lesson that is adaptable to pictorial presentation like this. If you try it, have every word uttered a quotation from Scripture.

What the Passover Meant

Your encyclopedia will tell you that there are many ancient meanings involved in this peculiar Hebrew feast. But to orthodox Jews always and everywhere it has meant the awesome night at the close of the captivity in Egypt when the Israelites were spared in the death of the first-born, when a hasty meal was provided and all was ready for the escape of a people when the hour came. The lamb was roasted whole—no time for prepared dishes. The bread was unleavened—no time to await the rising of leaven. The bitter herbs hastily plucked were the only garnish, and reminded all of the bitterness of bondage. With garments girt all stood eagerly ready to go on the dash to freedom.

Yet withal Dr. H. Clay Trumbull tells us that Passover did not originally mean merely "passing by" or skipping these Hebrew houses. It really meant "passing over" the threshold, entering in to renew covenanted blessings, instead of sending in the Dark Messenger to slay. This seems to be borne out by the custom of having a vacant chair at the feast for Elijah or for the Messiah, of which Dr. E. A. Steiner told us so eloquently. In other words, Jehovah is never content merely to pass by with his penalty of doom; he enters in as a welcome guest to abide with his own. So it certainly should be with us now that "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us." The God who is in Christ does not pass by those who are Christ's; he passes over their hearts' thresholds to dwell in them by faith.

The Lord's Supper

It was after a solemn observance of this Hebrew festival that Jesus instituted his Memorial Feast for his disciples. In countless cases we have left the Lord's Supper unexplained to our boys and girls too long. Here is our chance to show its meaning, in its likenesses and differences when compared to the paschal festival. The Christian Communion is even a scantier feast according to our modern observance than the Hebrew Passover. Just a morsel of bread and a sip of wine for each! But how deep its meaning, how inspiring its lessons! As we partake we are all members of a larger family than Israel, one family in heaven and on earth, cared for by one Father, and in deepened brotherhood we forgive one another our trespasses and draw nearer in spirit. We remember our great Master, his teachings, his life, his sacrifice for us on the cross. We learn again that love always means sacrifice. As we pledge ourselves once more to be his loyal disciples and friends, we go forth in his name to serve and if need be to suffer with him. The Lord's Supper is full of holy joy, of heart searching, of new consecration for every sincere Christian.

The Protestant interpretation of the Lord's Supper is more like the Passover than the Catholic. We who are Protestants think of it as above all a teaching ordinance, impressing truth upon our hearts by its symbolism. Therefore its value to us is largely in understanding its meaning and taking part intelligently and thoughtfully, as well as reverently. The Catholic Church thinks of it as a supernatural rite, not dependent upon the comprehension of its participants at all.

Modern Religious Festivals

Our sub-topic is "the value of religious festivals." One has but to pause and think of it to know what tremendous help the whole world gains from the observance of Christmas and Easter. The birth of Christ is universally celebrated and becomes to millions a challenge to interest in childhood in his name. Neglected children are sought out and ministered unto. The poor are helped, the sick visited. Every one celebrates God's great gift by giving to others. It has a sweetening effect upon the national life. Abuses caused our Puritan fathers to abolish Christmas-keeping, but we are glad to have seen so great a revival of its true spirit—community Christmases, carol-singing everywhere, and a real determination to enthrone the Christ on his birthday. Looking back, did you so partake of Christmas as to receive its spiritual power?

Easter comes three months hence. Its significance is not less than that of Christmas. Yet despite its wide celebration it does not "put over" its message nowadays quite so successfully. Men are not vividly assured of the Risen Life. The living Christ is not popularly as well known as the Babe of Bethlehem! Is that not a fact? Then let us who see the value of these observances plan to make very real to our constituency and our communities the message of the Day of Resurrection.

A National Celebration

The Jewish festivals all combined the patriotic with the religious, and we do well to imitate them in this respect. Thanksgiving Day has become America's own distinctive religious festival, and combines most happily the national and the spiritual. Last fall it had more of the sacred in it than ever before, and it becomes our duty to keep it so. Is it not possible for the Church to lay hold of Independence Day—the Passover of our nation—and to make it as thoroughly religious as any festival we have? It is certain that democracy needs the spirit of God more than anything else. And we know that our Republic needs the Mosaic warning, "Beware lest thou forget Jehovah thy God."

Next month, February, we have the birthdays of our two national heroes, Lincoln and Washington. In many places the Church and Sunday school ignore these anniversaries, leaving to the public school the sole task of interpreting the lessons of these lives. But the school cannot give due emphasis to the things of the soul. It is the Church that can make the children see that the same God who was with Moses was with our founders and builders, and is with his people still. It is just time now to start a Sunday school recognition of these national holidays in honor of our Moses and our David.

The Passover held its power, and holds it still, because it is so inclusive in its symbols. As has been pointed out, it is Thanksgiving Day, Independence Day and Watch-Night all rolled into one. It is also Emancipation Day, a deliverance from slavery, and Labor Day, marking the blessing of God upon the toilers. John of Damascus made it a type of Easter in his hymn:

"Come ye Faithful, raise the strain
  Of triumphant gladness!
God hath brought his Israel
  Into joy from sadness.
Loosed from Pharaoh's bitter yoke
  Jacob's sons and daughters,
Led them with unmoistened foot
  Through the Red Sea waters.

'Tis the spring of souls today:
  Christ hath burst his prison;
From the frost and gloom of death
  Light and life have risen.
All the winter of our sins,
  Long and dark, is flying
From his light to whom we give Thanks and praise undying."

Bible Drill Work I

MANY teachers and superintendent feel the need of graded Bibl drills which they can give in th class or from the platform in five- to ten minute periods.

One of the best of these drill exercise was originated by Dr. Frank Woodbur of Halifax, N. S., a member of the Executive Committee of the World's Sunday School Association. It has bee used extensively in Canada by differen denominations and with success. Part of it are given here, and its use is earnestly urged both as a matter of variety and added interest in the school session, and because these drills lay th foundation in memory of essential Bible and Church facts and texts.

The Bowery Mission in War and Peace

NEVER at any time in its history has the Bowery Mission done a better work than it is doing today. It seems as though the full fruitage of many years of laborious seed-sowing is just now becoming evident. Although conditions in the Bowery, both moral and physical, have undergone a complete change, it never presented a better or more hopeful field for missionary effort than at the present time. There never were so many men in the Bowery as there are today. This is due to the demand for men during the progress of the war. The Bowery quickly established itself as a clearing-house for unskilled labor, and hundreds of men have been sent away every day to positions in the country. Many of these transients are found in the nightly meetings of the Mission, and here the Gospel is preached in great simplicity and power by men who have been redeemed themselves.

The direct contribution of the Bowery Mission to the fighting forces of the country in the war may be judged from the fact that the Mission's Roll of Honor contains one hundred and thirty-three names! These one hundred and thirty-three men are not all converts of the Mission, but are in some way connected with it, and messages have been continually received of the most intense interest.

Lieutenant Walter A. Balevre has a very warm place in the hearts of Bowery men because he is the youngest son of the Mission organist, Mr. Charles Balevre, who has held that position for the last fourteen years and is the leader of the Bowery Mission Brotherhood. At the recent Christmas Day meeting, a very interesting letter was read from Lieutenant Balevre, which amongst other things contains the following:

"As you get all the news from the papers, it is useless for me to describe the events of these days, but they are the greatest days I have ever experienced. Two months ago and thereabouts I was in No-Man's Land, and now I am seeing events from another standpoint. I am doing engineer depot work at a large and noted French city in the famous chateau country of the Loire. cannot emphasize strongly enough how glad I am to be over here, and to have done what I could for heroic France, as well as Belgium, Great Britain, and the United States, in the sacred cause of liberty and justice. Every one in the American Expeditionary Force feels that way, and we are certainly filled with enthusiasm to have heard how whole-heartedly and efficiently the people back in the States took up and pushed the work in every way—industrially, financially and morally. I have seen many ruined villages where all the inhabitants have been deported, and many other instances of the Huns' vandalism, and miles and miles of desolated lands, and I hope they hold all German prisoners of war to do the work of rebuilding.

"When I arrived on this side I was sorry I had not come a great deal sooner, for I find France a wonderful place. I believe all members of the American Expeditionary Force are going to bring back with them ideas and inspirations which are going to have a broad effect on future development. The war in its issues and outcome is surely a great practical lesson in the justice and good of Christianity, and a thousand sermons will be preached on the Kaiser's blasphemous career. He posed as another Napoleon, or Julius Cæsar, or Alexander, but has turned out to be a Nero or Attila."

The Bowery Mission is in great need of funds. Notwithstanding the great demand for men, many who are incapacitated for work through sickness, old age, shabby appearance, and general inefficiency, are in the same old condition of destitution and suffering as in former years. In these bitter winter months they come in great numbers and must be cared for by the Mission. On the other hand, the great charities that have done such an inestimable work in connection with the war have made great demands upon the generosity of the people, and home institutions have in a large measure been overlooked. Christian Herald readers, however, can always be relied upon to support this old institution when they know of its needs. The Mission needs that support at the present time. If you have not already done so, send in your contribution to the Christian Herald office, Bible House, New York City. You may rest happy in the assurance that no money you give for the help of your fellow creatures at the present time will be more carefully or effectively used.

A Mission's Work in War Time

THE Annual Report of the Nyasaland Mission, Central Africa, just received by the North American Council (153 Institute Place, Chicago, Norman H. Camp, secretary), shows that in spite of the many hindrances due to the war and the Chilemwe rebellion near Blantyre, 2,874 members were received into the church during the past year by baptism. Also 1,370 adults have broken with heathenism during the past year and been admitted into the baptism classes. The Gospel has been preached every week to 42,000 adults and children. The work of translating the entire Bible into the native language, the Chinyanga, has just been completed by Rev. W. H. Murray, assisted by Rev. Napier of the Presbyterian Church. This gigantic task has required ten years of active labor on the part of Rev. Dr. Murray, and gives a million people the entire Bible in their own language. Through the sacrificing efforts of the Church in South Africa, the missionaries on the field and the native Christians, a deficit was wiped out and a goodly balance left in the mission treasury. The Nyasaland Mission was founded in 1890 by the late Rev. Andrew Murray, D.D., and is laboring in Nyasaland, Northeastern Rhodesia and Portuguese East Africa. They earnestly solicit the prayers and support of God's people.

What Would Happen

If Every Child Could do This?

Suppose every child could see Puffed Grains—whole-grain bubbles, puffed to eight times normal size.

Suppose every child could taste them—airy, flaky, flimsy tidbits with a toasted almond flavor.

Do you think any child would ever cease to want them in his home?

If All Mothers Knew

Suppose all mothers knew what millions know—that Puffed Grains are the ideal grain foods.

That Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are whole grains steam-exploded. And that every food cell has been blasted for easy, complete digestion.

Would many mothers let their children miss these scientific foods?

Puffed Grains are the greatest foods ever made from wheat, rice or corn.

They are the most delicious, the most digestible.

They are winsome morsels, thin and airy, nut-like in their flavor. Yet they are simply grain foods in which every atom feeds.

Serve all three kinds, for each Puffed Grain has its own fascinations.

Better than a mustard plaster

Once when grandma's joints commenced to ache and twinge, she used to go to the mustard pot and make a mustard plaster. Now she goes to Musterole and gets relief, but does without the blister and the plaster, too!

My, how good that Musterole feels when you rub it in gently over that lame back and those sore muscles. First you feel the gentle tingle, then the delightful, soothing coolness that reaches in the twinging joints or stiff, sore muscles.

It penetrates to the heart of the congestion. This is because it is made of oil of Mustard and other home simples. And the heat generated by Musterole will not blister.

On the contrary the peculiarity of Musterole lies in the fact that shortly it gives you such a cool, relieved feeling all about the twingey part.

And Musterole usually brings the relief while you are rubbing it on. Always keep a jar handy.

Many doctors and nurses recommend Musterole.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practic

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

BY THE time this copy of the Christian Herald reaches you, fellow idealists scattered all over the world, New Year's Day will have come and gone. So instead of wishing you just a "Happy New Year," I am going to wish you an "Earnest Year: a year dedicated to the ideals for which our American soldiers and sailors have died in this war."

Surely, never in all the history of the human race was there a New Year season so holy as this one! Never was so great a responsibility upon the shoulders of a world!

That responsibility is yours, and mine, fellow Adventurers. Not the littlest child among us can escape it. For the debt we owe to those who gave their lives (who went singing to their death) that this world of ours might be a better place to live in, can never be repaid save by a devotion, a consecration, equal to theirs. We are not asked to die for their Cause. We are asked to live for it. We are asked to see that this world does indeed become a better place to live in. This is our charge: the torch flung to us from dying hands.

Ours it is to seize that torch and lift it up so that it will light our particular world-corner. It is going to be needed everywhere, and carried everywhere. It is going to throw light on ancient cobwebs in our civic and personal life; and at its approach evil things are going to scuttle away in the dark. We are going to give this old world of ours the biggest housecleaning it has ever known!

The things to be done are myriad. There may be a prison system in our state or a jail in our town that needs complete renovation. The milk we are drinking may be impure, due to careless handling. Our district school may be a blot on the county. Perhaps there are no wholesome amusements or gathering-places for young folks in our town. Or our state roads may be bad; our state orphan and insane asylums in a sorry condition. There may be laws to change, and streets to grade, saloons to banish, trees to plant, foreigners to be Americanized, struggling families to help, or a civic spirit to be awakened in your town and mine, Neighbors.

Whatever the evil, let us banish it; whatever the cobweb, let us pull it down. While thus engaged, we shall come across many beautiful evidences of efforts made in the past by some neighbor with vision to improve things at least a little.

This first adventure will appeal to all of us within sight of whose windows foreign settlers are living:

Assimilating the Stranger

BECAUSE of the joy I have experienced in neighboring, I wish to tell you about it. Perhaps others may take courage and do likewise.

"From our ranch home we can look over a strawberry patch worked by Japanese. Day after day these little strangers sit on the ground weeding or picking strawberries. They live in shacks, the children playing in the dirt or the irrigation ditches. Since their arrival I have never looked out of my kitchen window that I have not wished to help the 'stranger in a strange land.' Recently a friend and I decided to try a Sunday school for them. We asked one who could speak a little English. She said 'Yes,' and invited us to meet in her home.

"A few of the children go to public school, and so can understand some English. We showed them the picture of Naomi and Ruth, and told them we wanted to be their friends. As we look back over the year's work, we see how wonderfully they have responded. Now they have three classes and a growing Sunday school.

"But this was only part of our neighboring. We also wanted to reach the mothers. We could not get them to come when the children did, as it is harder for them to learn, and they are bashful. So I decided to have a party.

"By sign language and the help of the oldest little girl, I invited them to my home. I must confess I was puzzled to know how to entertain them, as they could speak only a few words of English. I depended on my friend to help me; but she was sick and could not come. It also rained; and only five came. These, after much scraping of feet and bowing of heads (they are very polite), came up on the porch. I had fairly to push them into the living-room. They exclaimed, 'Very nice!' and, after being seated, began among themselves to talk of everything in the room. Then my mother, who is eighty, showed them her embroidery and the sweaters she was knitting for the soldiers. These interested them greatly. They venerate age, and showed their respect in sign language. Next, I passed picture books among them. And what do you think they enjoyed most? the copies of the Christian Herald with Japanese covers on them! How they hung over those, chattering about home! The one of October 10 they could hardly let alone.

"Next we had our little tea. I had set my table with as much care as though for my best friends; and they were delighted with everything. I would tell them the names of the foods, and they would repeat them. When they said: 'Please pass the butter,' they laughed and laughed, it sounded so queer. Of the potato chips they said: 'Like candy,' and of the biscuit, 'Very nice; you make?' I said yes; and they said: 'We no boil dry': meaning they do not bake, as they have no ovens.

"I had two chopsticks, and tried to use them, greatly to their amusement. They enjoyed showing me how to eat properly. After tea they were more ready to talk and repeat words. So we had a fine visit, until, with many more bows and thank-yous, they departed."—MRS. RUTH WATSON, California.

Cities and towns usually have libraries, and good ones. But many a village has no e; and the farm community with a library is unusual indeed:

Founding Community Library

WE WERE an isolated band of homesteaders, and we sadly missed the accustomed privilege of having free access to a library. Therefore we sent a request to the State Librarian for information concerning the free traveling libraries. She sent us the desired pamphlet, together with a card which was to be signed by twelve adult members of the community. This card, together with the fee of a dollar to cover transportation charges, was sent back. In due time our library of fifty volumes came—thirty books for adults and twenty for children.

"At the last meeting of our Young People's Community Club we had discussed the matter of the library and had chosen a librarian. Our choice was based on the consideration of the librarian's home being easily accessible to all who desired the use of the library. She kept a simple record of books loaned and returned, and also made herself familiar with the contents of the books, so that she could give any asked-for information.

"We kept the library for six months, when we sent for a new consignment. During most of the time the books were freely circulating. Eventually we also subscribed for three good magazines, which were circulated among the families of the neighborhood."—ELLEN ERICKSON, Minnesota.

And now, fellow Adventurers, we come to a delightful instance of community co-operation. This same interest and energy, applied to a village or town, would make it the envy of the state:

Community Builds a Bridge

THE early settlers in W——, Minnesota, found as a 'hotel' a long low log building on the bank of the Crow Wing River; and at the foot o the hill, tethered to a pine tree, a boat Usually some one from the hotel volunteered to 'set' one over the river.

"But if you came with a team (eithe oxen or horses) or on horseback, a many did, you must ford the river. I you could sight right and 'hit the trail in spite of the current, the water woul only be well up to the horses' backs but woe betide if you missed the trail for there were sink-holes where team and wagon would go out of sight in a hurry.

"Two energetic women started the ball rolling for a bridge. They got up a petition and circulated it among the settlers. It called for men volunteers to work on a bridge and provide teams, and also asked for donations of money where possible. The men signed up in fine shape, and a prominent lumberman gave a large donation.

"Then our women took their petition to the County Commissioner's meeting and asked help from the county. The Commissioner agreed to see that the bridge was built. He sent a man to superintend the work, and furnished all the material lacking. The result was a nice substantial bridge eighteen feet wide and six hundred feet long, covered with heavy planks, and with a good four-foot railing along either side. The piers were built of log and filled with stone. A jolly celebration capped the climax."—NEIGHBOR.

Our last adventure for today is a homey, human one. How I wish every rural community had this same spirit! Many have; but in some, such fellowship is unknown:

The Brotherhood of Man

THE Adventure that came to us can boast of no set rules or organized effort, and when written down may sound too commonplace to be of interest. But to our family this experience has been of untold joy and inspiration.

"My husband and I and our two children moved, one midwinter, to a farm we had rented in an entirely strange neighborhood. Country life was new to us; there were no telephones; our house was quite a distance from the road; and so, after the necessary work incident to moving was done, our loneliness was indescribable.

"The first Sunday morning I stood by the window watching the smoke from the chimneys of our nearest neighbor ascending straight into the bitterly cold air. How distant that smoke looked! It seemed to say: 'We own our farms; we have plenty of tried and true friends; we are too busy to notice transients and renters.'

"That week passed, and the second Saturday night closed in, cold and sleety. We felt more lonely than ever as we gathered around the fire.

"The first knock on the door startled us and brought a growl from Shep, the only inhospitable one of the family. It was Mr. Smith, our neighbor to the north, one of the best friends we ever came to know; and his initial visit was certainly a comfort. Before many days others came, and soon we were invited to a 'surprise party.' It seemed strange indeed for me to bake a cake for a party to be held at a house I had never seen, and for a host and hostess whom I never met. However, it was all delightful.

"We went to the party by wagonloads: the entire neighborhood coming. The children were welcomed and taken to a room by themselves, where hilarious sounds proclaimed special good times. The young people played old-fashioned games and seemed pleased if the older ones participated. The ladies visited and helped with the supper, while the men who were not playing games talked and 'saved the nation.' At this party the surprise was a success from our point of view, at least, when we found ourselves the guests of honor because we were 'strangers within the gates.'

"Oh, the gatherings we had afterwards—quiltings, rag-sewings in springtime, ice-cream socials in summer, melon parties in autumn and oyster suppers in winter! It was notably a Christian community. God's blessing was always asked before we partook of the bounties provided.

"And when adversity came to any one, these fun-loving neighbors were the first to lend a willing hand. 'Bert is sick. Let's gather his corn for him'; 'Nettie has so much sewing to do. Let's take our thimbles and help her Thursday'; 'We must encourage the teacher by having our Thanksgiving dinner at the schoolhouse'—expressions like these were in the air continually. And best of all, in the years of visiting I never heard an unkind remark made against an absent one.

"Now we own a home with most of the modern conveniences and occasionally we roll past this old place in our automobile. We see the rocky, hilly fields, the inadequate barn, the small, inconvenient house, so cold in winter and warm in summer, without cellar, cistern or porches. But we say: 'How happy we were there!' Happy? Yes—just because the neighborly spirit prevailed to an extent we have never seen before nor since."—MRS. A., Kansas.

Our meeting today has been an earnest one; a quiet and thoughtful one. But I believe that from it we shall take away something—a holy purpose perhaps—which will help to cancel the debt we owe to the lads who have "gone west."

The Neighbors' Forum

CAN any of the neighbors let me know the address of any member of a Mr. Frazer's family who lived in Virginia before the Civil War? I do not know Mr. Frazer's first name. He came from Scotland and was a brother of my grandfather. I want to know my cousins and would appreciate any information any one might give.—MISS F.

DEAR YOUNG WIDOWS EVERYWHERE: I have just lost my husband, and my heart goes out to all others thus bereaved, for I know how lonely the coming year will be. I live in a small town, and love to write letters and receive them. I know we are all the same. We love to talk of our dear ones, and at times it seems that those around us grow tired of listening. They still have their loved ones with them. It is quite a comfort to pour out one's heart in a letter, and perhaps, by bearing one another's burden, we might lessen our own sorrow. I would love to hear from any of you who would care to write me; and will answer. Miss Connolly will give you my address.—A LONELY YOUNG WIDOW.

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: May I have the pleasure of saying "Thank You" for the inserting of Deaconess Shepperson's notice regarding the "lame dog" up North? To my many correspondents I send my warmest greetings and thanks.

Wishing you all peace and good will without measure during 1919, I am yours gratefully, TOM CUMMING, Canada.

DEAR NEIGHBORS: I certainly have received many fine letters, and I am writing this to thank you. I shall answer them all.—LONELY GIRL OF FIFTEEN.

NEIGHBORS: Two suggestions from me. There is an old lady in Massachusetts who longs for letters and post cards. And there is on my desk a good recipe for home-made soap, a copy of which I will gladly send to any one furnishing a stamped, self-addressed envelope.—VERA L. CONNOLLY.

ʀepenting (Our Relation to God)

hristian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Mark 1 : 14-20

IN THE beautiful communion service of the Protestant Episcopal Church the invitation is to "Ye who do ruly and earnestly repent of your sins nd are in love and charity with your eighbors," and in the prayer which llows the people cry "We acknowledge nd bewail our manifold sins and ickedness. . . . We do earnestly re-ent and are heartily sorry for these ur misdoings. The remembrance of hem is grievous unto us, the burden of hem is intolerable."

Before the Judge of all the earth we tand condemned, our greatest virtues re as filthy rags before His righteous-ess, our sins cry out against us. We an have no relation to God while sin ules our life. God's salvation is ready, eely offered, but it is as sinners saved y grace that we enter the company f the saints and grace waits upon at godly sorrow, genuine repentance.

Repentance is the basic stone of e structure of Christian discipleship. epentance is something more than eing sorry. We may be sorry for an t without abhorring the thought that spired it. Caught stealing jam and hieving thereby some physical in-onvenience, we may be mostly sorry at we got so little jam before the iscovery. That is not repentance. rue repentance involves a change of e heart by which both the particular n and the sinful nature back of it ecome anathema to us. When, thus, e remembrance becomes grievous d the burden intolerable, the hour grace has come and from the penitent rm we step out into the light of rgiveness through Christ our Lord. hose who have repented and whose arts have been washed clean of the ains and tendencies of sin find a new orld. The heart cleansed of sin is ady for love and charity, for all that mpany of Christian graces which make e halo of the saints of God. The sin-r repentant, saved by grace, faces world of opportunity for good and od. To some of those baptized by John unto repentance Jesus came with the invitation to discipleship and the promise of a wider usefulness.

Epworth League Topic. Luke 4 : 16-21: Act 17 : 26

DEMOCRACY is a state built upon the individual. Its power is the sum of the strength of its citizens. Its weakness is the sum of their incapacities or failures. Every citizen who lusts for that which is another's, who seeks private gain at the expense of his fellows, who winks at graft because winking prospers business, every citizen who loses his individuality now and then in the cup which inebriates, who idles when he might produce, who steals what he cannot earn, who is a center of contention, who is brutal or unclean, every such citizen weakens democracy and saps the strength of the state.

Every citizen who is just, who is just even when justice means cost to himself, every citizen who thinks clearly and honestly, who is kind and sober and fair, who refuses to enter unseemly strife but stands always ready to fight for the right, who seeks to make his time and his labor fully productive, who refuses to take part in or tolerate crookedness in shop or politics, who recognizes his debt to his fellows and stands ready to spend himself for another's good, every such citizen adds to the strength of the state and it is upon such that democracy rests; without them anarchy soon governs.

The religion of the Lord Jesus Christ makes citizens fit for democracy and nothing will make democracy safe for the world or the world safe for democracy except this religion of the risen Lord. No man-spun theories of social reorganization can create a millennium. Only men who fear God and love his children, who are so soundly converted that they see that Christianity is social as well as individual, in whom grace has driven out lust, and love has banished selfishness, can become safe citizens of a safe democracy.

The Week in the World's News

LLOYD GEORGE WINS ELECTION. The counting of the votes at the British elections was deferred until December 28. The result was a complete sweep for the Coalition Government headed by Lloyd George. He and all of his ministers were reelected by great majorities and the government majority in the new Parliament will be 235 out of a membership of 707 with an additional block of 46 unionists counted as friendly. All the pacifists and obstructionists were defeated, as was Arthur Henderson, leader of the Labor Party, who had not always been whole-heartedly with Lloyd George. The Irish Nationalists lost most of their seats to the Sinn Fein candidates, electing only 7 to the Sinn Fein's 72, but it was not expected that the new Irish members would take their seats. There was a rumor that they might declare the Irish Republic in being and attempt to start a Parliament at Dublin. Former Premier Asquith was defeated.

FRENCH PEACE TERMS. Stephen Pichon, French Foreign Minister, on December 29, in the Chamber of Deputies, in answer to various interpellations from the Socialist opposition, declared regarding the peace terms demanded by France that the utmost publicity should be given the proceedings of the peace conference, that France had adopted the principle of the League of Nations, that the Government desired no annexations, but reserved the right to fix the frontiers of Alsace-Lorraine to guard against future attack, and that intervention in Russia was inevitable. He explained that intervention was now a fact, French troops having landed at Odessa to support a loyal Russian force of 100,000 which had already captured Perm with 18,000 prisoners.

SHIPS FOR BELGIAN RELIEF. It was announced on December 25 that Herbert Hoover had completed a survey of the physical damage done in Belgium by the Germans. He found that President Wilson's warning against wanton destruction had borne fruit, and that except for a 20-mile strip near the fighting line the communications had remained undamaged. He asked for 160,000 tons of shipping in addition to that already assigned to Belgian Relief and it was announced that 180,000 tons of food-stuffs would be shipped from this country monthly. President Wilson was reported on December 29 to be working for the appointment of a Director-General of Relief for Europe.

DISORDER IN BERLIN. With 85,000 persons idle in Berlin and the Spartacides active in the business of creating discontent, the German Liberals went ahead with their program for the early organization of a new government, declaring for a united Germany to include German-Austria, for strong industry, healthy trade and free peasants on free soil. But orders from the Ebert Government to the Bolshevik-inclined sailors, who had come to Berlin to support the Government against the reactionaries, sending the sailors back to the coast ports, precipitated a rebellion on December 23 on the part of the sailors, in which they took refuge in the Royal palace and the Royal stables. They were attacked with machine guns and artillery by loyal troops. On December 27 the palace had been considerably damaged and the troops had driven most of the sailors out of the building, but they were still strongly intrenched in the stables. Later they capitulated on the promise of amnesty. There was a report on December 27 that the Ebert Government had given place to an Independent Socialist Government headed by Hugo Haase. After several days of conflicting rumors, in which the turbulent Spartacides were pictured as seizing the power in Berlin, dispatches of December 29 showed that Herr Ebert had come through the disturbances with increased power, and that instead of the Majority Socialists resigning the Independents, Haase, Barth and Dittman, had resigned. The people were reported as bitter against the reds in Berlin, there being a strong movement afoot to remove the capital to some city less burdened with radicalism. The whole situation according to several correspondents revolved around the questions of food and employment.

ABOUT THE PEACE TABLE. Paris dispatches of December 26 said that the general outlines of the make-up of the Peace Conference had been laid down and that the conference would consist of from 100 to 120 delegates representing the 27 nations which declared war on Germany. The United States, Great Britain, France and Italy would each have five delegates, according to this report, and the other nations from one to four, according to their size and the interests involved. It was said also that no neutrals would be represented in the conference, but that neutrals having any matters to come before the sessions could present their case to one of the Allied nations, which would bring it before the delegates. There will be no delegates from the Central empires in the conference. When the outlines of the final decisions have been prepared the German, Austrian, Bulgarian and Turkish delegates will have the pleasure of accepting them. The neutrals will have representation in any sessions in which the formation of a League of Nations is considered. There seems to be a tendency to omit Germany and her partners from the League of Nations until such time as they had proved their right to membership by exemplary conduct.

A BILLION LOSS ON WHEAT. The House Agricultural Committee is convinced that the Government guarantee of $2.26 a bushel for wheat offered for sale before June, 1920, may cost the Government a billion dollars. The sudden end of the war has so changed conditions that Argentine and Australian wheat is now being delivered at $1.35 a bushel. Prospects also indicate an American crop of about a billion bushels of wheat in 1919, each of which may cost the Government as much as a dollar in order to make good on its guarantee. There is no thought, however, but that the Government will go through with its program.

BRINGING THE BOYS HOME. On December 26, 68,000 men had been brought back from overseas and General Pershing had designated 20,000 more for early sailing. Eleven ships sailed for America with soldiers homeward bound on that day. On the same day it was announced that 500,000 men had been mustered out in the camps at home, and on December 28 General March said that a total of over 1,100,000 men were slated for early discharge. On January 1, the army had ships enough in service to bring back 160,000 a month. Efforts were being made to increase the capacity to 300,000 a month.

TO FREE MEXICAN CHURCHES. The Mexican Government has placed before the Senate the question of proposed amendments to that article of the present Mexican constitution which provides that a minister must be of Mexican birth in order to serve a church in Mexico. It is proposed to lift the barriers against ministers of foreign birth, while retaining state ownership of all immovable properties. This rule has been a great bar to evangelization in Mexico and its lifting will be heartily welcomed by missionary societies.

DR. FOSDICK] TO OLD FIRST. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, Professor of Practical Theology, at Union Theological Seminary, has been called to the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church of New York City, and has accepted. Dr. Howard Duffield and Rev. Dr. Chas. H. Parkhurst, formerly Pastor of Madison Square Church, become pastors emeriti. Rev. Dr. George Alexander, formerly pastor of University Place Church, will be associated with Dr. Fosdick, Dr. Fosdick filling the pulpit and Dr. Alexander taking up the toral work.

SENATE PASSES REVENUE BILL. War Revenue Bill, including ame ments fixing the total of the 1920 at $4,000,000,000 and repealing zone postal law, was passed by Senate on December 23. Other ame ments provided for a tax on semi-l uries, for a 100 per cent. assessment campaign contributions exceeding $5 and for bone-dry prohibition in District of Columbia. The bill w sent to conference; unless it is fina passed by January 15 it will be nec sary to make income and corporat tax collections under the old law.

Some of the outstanding paragraphs are as follows:

"There is a feeling of cordiality, fraternity and friendship between the two great nations. . . . I think you will agree with me that friendship is not a mere sentiment—patriotism is not a mere sentiment. It is based upon a principle, upon the principle that leads a man to give more than he demands.

"You know that heretofore the world has been governed, or at any rate the attempt has been made to govern it, by partnerships of interest, and that they have broken down. There is only one thing that can bind peoples together, and that is common devotion to right. . . .

"I want to say very frankly to you that she (The United States) is not now interested in European politics, but she is interested in the partnership of right between America and Europe. . . . She will join no combination of power which is not a combination of all of us. She is not interested merely in the peace of Europe, but in the peace of the world.

"There is a great voice of humanity abroad in the world just now which he who cannot hear is deaf. . . . We are not obeying the mandate of parties or of politics. We are obeying the mandate of humanity."

The President then declared his conviction that since friendship was based on good will and since the best settlement now to be made would contain elements of dissatisfaction it was necessary to create machinery to provide for readjustments.

The President and Mrs. Wilson left Manchester in the afternoon for London, where they had luncheon with the King. Their plans contemplated a return to Paris on Tuesday and a trip to Rome beginning New Year's eve, the stay in Italy to end January 10. It was reported that the President would return home about February 10.

Marion Harland's Corner

The Vexed Question

PART I

SINCE the publication of a familiar talk with Cornerites under the caption of "Cooks and Cooperation," I have received several letters which I have bound together, awaiting a convenient season for treating what one lively correspondent calls "The Vexed Question":

"None of the great army of martyrs whom it most nearly concerns will need explanation of the title," she writes. "We all know it at sight. And it was never vexeder than at the present time. One might imagine that, with all the other improvements American women have introduced into their lives, they would have reduced domestic service to something like a system; whereas our households remind one continually of the period in early Jewish history when every man did that which was right in his own eyes.' We have no acknowledged lawgiver, and, for that matter, no aws to be enforced if there were such an official. But why specify reigning disorders? Cannot you, who have exerised a maternal influence over us for so ong, give us a few hints that may serve s landmarks in the wilderness in which we are wandering? There must be aults on both sides."—CAROLINE S. D. New York State).

Before the receipt of the foregoing ppeal I had sketched mentally the talk or which the member asks, and gone so ar in the preparation of the same as to write out the heading:

Mistress and Maid

The alliteration is comely, and on the ther side of the ocean it would be aptly escriptive. In these United States the hanges of a quarter-century have abolhed the use of the first word in the sense nce applied to it. Within my memory was habitually upon the lips of domesc employees in alluding to the houseother. She was "the mistress," except hen confidentially mentioned as "she." ut she who now accepts the title of maid" was "the girl," from eighteen to ghty. "Servant" was not so much as amed in this connection.

T IS a curious puzzle, too abstruse for discussion here, how radical changes in cial and domestic nomenclature come pass by common and tacit consent. hen "mistress" went out, "maid" me in. Who hears now in kitchen, amber or intelligence office of the working-out girl?" Yet "girl" she mained in the mouths of all classes til, without formal proclamation, the maid" tripped to the front. About the me time, I remark in passing, she used to say "Yes, madam," or the breviation of "ma'am," exchanging for "Yes, Mrs. Smith, Jones or obinson."

There is a humorous side to what is w so universal that we no longer comnt upon it. The housewives of Amer are neither true to themselves nor to another in their practice of engaging ids, or in parting with them.

Suffer an illustration. Mr. Smith disvers that a trusted clerk is habitually honest, or has proved himself utterly fficient for the work assigned to him. e employer would be rated as untrue his order and lacking in a sense of nor if he were to give the discharged rk "clean papers" which would subt a brother business man to the anvances and losses which made it unsafe Mr. Smith to retain the offender in employ.

His wife (and this is not a hypothetcase) discovers that the cook whom has believed honest and has proved be competent has carried on for years ystem of peculation in pantry and eroom. Katy must go, of course; the late employer "cannot reconcile her conscience to deprive a working of a chance to earn her living." She tes a neat certificate as to the maid's d temper, neatness, ability as a cook, , with never a hint that she is disest. Mrs. Robinson, to whom the intelligence office sends the applicant for a "situation," assumes that the bearer would not have remained two years with Mrs. Smith if she were dishonest, and gladly engages her out of hand. I believe and hold for certain that, if housemothers were honest in dealing with their sisters, and as careful to protect other homes from what has plagued their own as they are solicitous to give the discharged maid "another chance," we should forthwith lay the foundation of a system of domestic service.

BEFORE going further, I would emphasize the fact that in severing business relations with our maid—let the reason for so doing be what it may—it is your bounden duty, as an honest Christian, not to let any private grudge or dislike color the certificate which may gain or lose another home for her. Be just, with a leaning toward mercy throughout the transaction. Let the same law guide you in inducting the newly engaged employee, and throughout all your dealings with her.

A well-thumbed book in my mother's library was "Live and Let Live," by an American writer, upon this very subject. One little scene is as clear to my mind as when I read it sixty years ago. The young maid, Lucy Lovel, had been goaded by her scolding mistress into a temperate retort which yet gave offense to Miss Aurelia, the fine young lady of the house. "Ma!" she broke in here to say, "how can you let your help be so saucy to you?"

Master Julius, the ten-year-old brother, took a different view of the case:

"If Ma don't want her help to be sassy to her, she hadn't ought to be sassy to her!"

One of the best housewives and best-bred women I know put the basic truth into different terms with the like meaning:

"I give my servants to understand, from the first, that I speak as respectfully to them as I expect them to speak to me."

The scold is a vulgarian, be she at the washtub or upon a throne.

Watts' injunction—"Let love through all your actions run, let all your words be mild"—holds good with mistress and maid as firmly as with parent and child.

FROM the beginning of your relationship with the employee, let gentle dignity and uniform kindness inform manner and speech. Establish a thorough understanding as to the number and nature of the duties that will devolve upon her. Leave no loophole for the complaint—"I did not expect to do this when I engaged," or "I understood that I was to have such and such days for going out," or any other of the loose ends of what should be a closely woven web. And having assured yourself that the bargain is plain to both parties, see that you comply conscientiously with your part of it. In a word—be businesslike, and conduct that business as merchant or manufacturer or professional man carries forward his lifework.

Added to this duty you have the element of motherly kindness, which men rarely have the opportunity to show in their daily walk and conversation with subordinates. The young woman in your kitchen or dining-room is some woman's daughter, and you are, while she is under your roof, in the capacity of guardian. Have an eye to her well-being as you would wish to have your child treated were she in the like position. Take into mind and heart all that sentence implies, and there is as little risk of "spoiling" your employee as of undue harshness. So far as in her lies, she should learn that hers is a respectable and useful profession, and that she should fit herself to practice it aright. Teach her to respect it and herself too highly to belittle it and lower her own character by despising the position. This is a branch of the vexed question that will be talked of next week. And the text of the talk will be a bonâ-fide letter from one who is not ashamed to call herself an "ex-servant." She shall have her say, and respectful consideration.

The Greatest Delusion of Parenthood

"This Hurts Me More Than It Does You"

YOU'VE heard the saying, of course. It is a parent's preface to barbarous punishment. Perhaps, as a child, you puzzled over how such a thing could be true. Perhaps as a parent you have said it yourself in all sincerity, believing it thoroughly, and feeling keenly the hurt it gave you to cause the child physical pain.

"This hurts me more than it does you."

Never in this world was a statement more false. It is the greatest delusion that a parent can fall into. Every blow struck in corporal punishment, whether with angry impulse or after meditation and decision, helps lay a foundation of bad qualities in the child's budding character—fear, cowardice, resentment, deceit, disobedience. And every harsh word spoken in quick annoyance drives these evils deeper.

Futures have been ruined in the name of that phrase. Lives of failure and unhappiness have their roots in it. True enough a loving parent may suffer more in mind than the child does in physical pain when a whipping is administered. True, too, that the child soon forgets his pain. But harm has been done, antagonism has been created where confidence is most needed, and the punishment has not even touched the causes of the child's misbehavior.

Now We Know Better

Our trouble has been that we have failed to gain the child's viewpoint in dealing with problems of discipline. Instead of perfect comradeship between parent and child, in most cases children have been forced to obey commands they did not understand, to accept judgments that seemed to them unjust and to suffer punishment for faults that the parents themselves created and developed in them. We have failed miserably in comprehending the child's mental outlook as he first finds himself in a strange, ironbound world of adults. We have not taken into account the finely balanced delicacy of the child-mind and how dangerously easy it is to ruin that wonderful mechanism permanently with thoughtless, hit-or-miss discipline. The result is apparent to us all in spoiled, distrustful children, in lives of failure and mediocrity and in life-long resentment against parents.

A truer understanding of these things has come and with it more enlightened methods of child training. Confidence and mutual respect are the corner stones of this better plan and parents everywhere who appreciate the faults of the old, harsh system are adopting it with results that are as astonishing as they are quick and certain. And it is found that this new art of parenthood actually takes less time to practice than the old.

The Charm of Confidence

After years of practical experience with children and thorough scientific research and study, Professor Ray C. Beery, A.B., A.M. (Harvard and Columbia), undertook the work of putting into written form for the use of parents this advanced method of bringing up children. Perfect confidence between parent and child is the sole basis of control. The system has been so successful that thousands of parents have hastened to adopt it. Their success has been uniform regardless of the great differences of temperament, inheritance and variations of character in the children themselves. The charm of confidence is irresistible when properly used in the management of children no matter what special peculiarities or what bad habits have been formed in the past.

The Parents Association is a national organization of men and women devoted to the interests of better parenthood, which has adopted the Beery Methods and instructs its members by mail in the application of these modern ideas.

Definite, Immediate Help

Professor Beery's Course in Practical Child Training is different from any former work that has been prepared to cover the subject. Definite instruction is given to parents in handling each case of misbehavior and the different ages of children from the cradle to 18 years of age are treated separately. The course shows by concrete illustrations and detailed explanations exactly what to do to meet every emergency and how to accomplish immediate results and make a permanent impression. In many cases good effects can be noticed almost over night. Child Training becomes a pleasure instead of an irksome duty.

The result is good children for bad; perfect control without the slightest friction; obedient respect for wilfulness and evasion; pleasing, graceful manner for bashfulness and rudeness; generosity, frankness, love and confidence for petty ways, obstinacy and uncontrolled temper.

Membership in the Parents Association entitles you to the complete course in Practical Child Training as well as several other valuable services such as consultation on individual problems and the advantage of hearing other members' experiences in cases that have any bearing on your own questions of discipline.

Free Book Explains All

"New Methods in Child Training" is the title of 24-page booklet which describes the work of the Association and explains Professor Beery's remarkable Course in Child Training. It also contains letters from members outlining the satisfactory results they have secured through the use of these new methods. Copy of this book will be sent at once to any interested parent who merely writes a letter or postcard, or mails the coupon below. There is no obligation in asking for this free book.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

The Spirit of Prayer

IT HAS been put on my heart to ask all Christians at this time to enter by God's grace into the spirit of 2 Cor. 6:2, and to pray as never before for two great objects. First: For a mighty revival throughout the earth. Second: For a special blessing of God upon the distracted people of Russia, and all the troubled people of the world. If ever there was a period of time marked by suitableness of circumstance and of opportunity, a day which as a point or period of time in the Divine purpose, that is pre-eminently the day or the time destined for salvation, it is to-day. The expert readers of the signs of the times have noticed throughout the world an extraordinary spirit of prayer. It is distinctly traceable in a strong sense of sin and failure, and in that longing for the Lord's blessing which is ever the indispensable condition of a great revival. The cry has gone out through a host of the world's intercessors: "O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years; revive us again, that thy people may rejoice in thee" (Hab. 3:2; Psa. 85:6). The great war is over. Surely a great religious revival is the next step in the Divine purpose. We would therefore plead that in private and in public Church gatherings all Christians resolve at once and incessantly to prove the efficacy of prayer, and so pray that a new Pentecost may descend upon the world, and that men and women may say with secret gladness: "Multitudes must have been praying." In this greatest war that is to follow the war let every Christian joyously enlist and begin at once, at home, in the Church Society, in the Prayer meeting, and in the Church service praying as never before with all supplication in the Spirit. Believe that now is the accepted time, that now is the day of salvation.

Dyson Hague.
Church of the Epiphany, Parkdale, Toronto, Can.

THE following beautiful prayer was sent by Rev. S. Z. Beam, D.D., of Tiffin, Ohio, one of the Old Guard of Christian Herald readers:

My Heart's Desire

Jesus, I come to thee;
  To whom else should I go?
Thou only hast the words of life
  Eternal to bestow.

Oh, let me hear thy voice,
  And all my sins forgive;
That in thy love I may rejoice,
  And in thy presence live.

My heart to thee I give,
  My Saviour and my King;
Oh, may my soul for ever live
  In tune thy praise to sing.

Let me not wander far Away from thy command;
And may I never vainly mar
  The work of thine own hand.

But guide me in the path
  That thou thyself hast trod,
The path of love and hope and faith
  That leadeth up to God.

The Thanksgiving service of the Memphis Noon Prayer Meeting was in some respects the greatest gathering since the movement started on January 19, 1914, with eight persons. About 500 persons were present, and the meeting had to adjourn to the main auditorium.

A little printed card has gone far a wide during the past year and has be the means of uniting persons in all par of the world in a daily noonday pray for our soldiers and sailors and others who strive for the freedom the world. The prayer consists in th silent repetition of some of God wonderful promises. It is called th Noonday Meditation, and has literal encircled the earth with one unbrok prayer.

A. H. writes of gracious answer prayer in the sending to her neighbo hood of a consecrated pastor, und whose ministrations the two Presb terian churches have joined in th worship of God, and it is hoped that th two churches will soon form a mo perfect union. The former pastor of o of the churches is now engaged in hon mission work, and the prayers of God children are asked for him, to the en that he may be led in the path of usefu ness to the glory of God and the salv tion of many precious souls. A. H. as for herself the prayers of God's childr that she may be divinely guided in h plans for attending a training school fit her better for service in the work the Master.

Mrs. G. O. C. asks prayers for h son, who has sailed for France, that may return home safely, but above a that she may know that he is soundl converted. At the same time she grat fully acknowledges answer to a pray for bodily healing which she request some time ago.

Mrs. E. C. sincerely believes that Go answers prayer. Twice when she h been in deep trouble and has fervent sought his help, he has answered h prayers in a wonderful way.

L. M. A., who is in deep trouble, yet glad to testify to the wonderf answers to prayer, and unites with th Prayer League every day at the noo hour, asking God to give each one of it members such blessing as in his wisdo he sees fit.

Coming-Back Times

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"I HATE going away," said the girl. She surveyed the little group of friends with more than a hint of noisture in her eyes. "I hate going way."

It was the Writer Man who answered ier.

"Life," said the Writer Man, "is ull of going-away times."

The girl blinked hurriedly before she esponded. And then--

"Don't you think that your attitude is bit pessimistic?" she asked. "Don't you hink that life is full of something much leasanter than going-away times?"

The Writer Man laughed uddenly.

"Of course ife is full of omething leasanter then oing-away imes," he told er. "Life is ul of coming-ack times! But ve wouldn't ver know the oy of coming ack if we lidn't first go way."

The Girl ooked at him. And as she did o her face rightened marvelously, and the hiat f a smile quite swept the unhappiness rom her eyes. But she didn't say—nuch.

"Oh—but I hadn't thought of that!' vas her only answer.

I SAID good-by and I sobbed a bit.
And the eyes of me grew dim;
And life to me seemed a dreary road,
A road that was long and grim.
I said good-by, and I turned away,
And my heart seemed cold and dead. . . .
But I raised my eyes to the evening skies
And the sunset clouds were red

With the light of hope—of a hope that told
Of another brighter day;
And a warmth crept into my very soul,
And the tear-mists swept away
From my sorry eyes, and my sobbing breath
Grew still, and I knew that I
Had found the light of a promise bright
In the glowing evening sky!

LIFE is full of going-away times. And there is always some cirumstance connected with the going way that is unpleasant. Even though he journey may be a wonderful ourney, full of achievement and accomlishment and dreams coming true, here will, at the moment of starting ipon it, be a shade of unhappiness. 'or there's never a journey—there's ever a going-away time—that doesn't nean the leaving behind of somebody. There's never a going-away time that loesn't involve a parting. And there's ever a parting that doesn't hold some ind of grief.

I SAID good-by to a soldier a year ago —a soldier who had enlisted from ivil life to fight the brave fight of his ountry. He was leaving a wife and a ather tiny baby at home, and he vasn't very happy about it.

"I think that going away from them s the hardest thing that I have ever ad to face," he told me. "I've been ip against it a good many times in my ife—when I didn't have any money, nd when I didn't pass my most mportant examination in college, and vhen my first big business deal failed. And I thought, each time, that I had ouched the absolute limit of unhappiess. But I hadn't. Saying good-by o the wife, and looking at the little ellow, and thinking that I may never ee him again, are about the most remendous things I've ever had to ace!"

There wasn't a great deal, then, for ne to say. I remember that I wrung is hand—that I murmured something ommonplace about doing the worthvhile thing, about the hardest battle eing the one he was meeting now—There was not very much that I could ay!

But a month ago I met that soldier gain. I met him swinging down 'ifth Avenue—a bronzed, well-set-up igure of a man, even though one of his rms rested in a sling. And he greeted ne with enthusiasm.

"I don't think," he told me after a noment, "that I'll ever again feel the bsolute joy that I felt when I first saw ny wife and baby after a year. It seems s if our love has been growing every ninute of the time that I've been away. And as for the baby—well, you'd iever believe how he's shot up! And he knew me right away—the smart little chap! It seems that they've been showing him my picture every day since I've been gone. . . . I tell you what, I've known some happy moments in my life! But there's never been anything so wonderful, before, as this home-coming of mine."

I murmured something commonplace, just as, a year before, I had murmured something commonplace. For there wasn't much that I could say! It was only after I had left him that I remembered our previous conversation. And suddenly I laughed, and the whole of Fifth Avenue with its gay shops and its brightly costumed throngs seemed laughing with me. And the laughter was a glad, joyous sort of laughter.

I'VE known people who have suffered badly for years from some affliction that a slight operation would have cured—suffered because they didn't dare have that slight operation. I've known people who have failed dismally in their life work because they didn't dare take the chance that would have made that life work a success. I've known people who have never known the joy of home-comings because they have never dared to experience the pain of partings. And all of these people have missed the fundamental thing out of life—and they will probably never know just what they have missed!

"Life," said the Writer Man, "is full of going-away times!" And he was right. Life is made up of going-away times—times that may be extremely painful. But, as the Writer Man also said, "Life is full of something much pleasanter. Life is full of coming-back times!"

Oh, friends of mine, don't be afraid to face the partings of life! Because there is something very wonderful that always comes after the parting-time. And that very wonderful thing is the time when folk shall meet again.

I talked once with a very, very old lady.

"Folk often ask me," she said, "if I'm afraid to die. And I always tell them, when they ask me, that I'm not.

"Of course the thought of leaving my loved ones is hard. But I'm so sure, dear, so very sure, that I can't be sorry. For I know that we'll all meet again. I can't be afraid while I'm able to say to myself: "It's only for a little while."

And there she had the secret of everything. No parting can be hard—whether it be a little superficial parting or the Great Parting—if one can say to oneself, "It's only for a little while." No going away can hold a lasting bitterness if one begins, as soon as one leaves to think of, and plan for, and dream about the coming-back time. And the harder—oh, remember this!—the parting may be, the more wonderful will be the return.

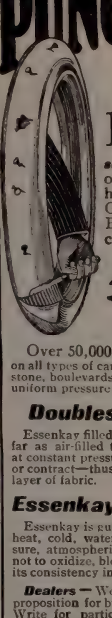
THE Freedmen's Aid Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church gives, in a recent issue of the Christian Educator, the result to date of the problem which that denomination is working out in the effort to make the Negro a self-respecting, self-supporting Christian man and citizen. It shows that in its twenty colored conferences, which own $9,573,336 worth of church property including 210 parsonages, there are 348,477 members, who contributed in 1918 to the benevolences of the church $141,740 as compared with a trifle over $2,000 in 1868. Of this amount between $40,000 and $50,000 was for the endowment of schools of the Freedmen's Aid Society. The Board of Home Missions and Church Extension contributes $59,000 yearly to the aid of the church's work among the colored people.



PUNCTURES and BLOWOUTS IMPOSSIBLE

ESSENKAY is the final solution to the tire problem. It eliminates punctures, blowouts and tire troubles. No air is used, therefore no inner tubes. No spare tires are necessary. Tires installed with Essenkay wear down to the last layer of fabric, then the Essenkay may be used again in new tires, hence the first cost is the last cost. Used by United States Government, Municipalities, 50,000 Farmers, Doctors, Lawyers, Business Men and others, on all kinds of passenger cars, trucks, converted tractors, etc.

Essenkay
A TIRE FILLER

Rides Like Air Not a Liquid

"Over 50,000 Users"

Over 50,000 motorists have tested and used it under all conditions of roads on all types of cars, trucks and converted tractors. No road is too exacting—mud, muck, sands, stone, boulevards or cobble pavements—Essenkay absorbs the shocks and maintains constant, uniform pressure in the casings.

Doubles Tire Mileage

Essenkay filled tires run two to five times as far as air-filled tires. Essenkay keeps tires at constant pressure—does not flatten, expand or contract—thus tires wear down to the last layer of fabric.

Essenkay is Guaranteed

Essenkay is guaranteed not to be affected by heat, cold, water, mud, sand, friction, pressure, atmospheric or climatic conditions, and not to oxidize, bloom, rot, crumble nor change its consistency in any way.

Dealers — We have an exclusive dealers' proposition for business men who can qualify. Write for particulars, stating qualifications and experience.

THE ESSENKAY PRODUCTS CO.
224 W. Superior St., Chicago
Member American Tire Filler Industry (Inc.)

First Cost Last Cost

Essenkay should last from five to six years When tires wear down to the last layer of fabric and are discarded, the Essenkay can be used in new tires, hence it is an investment, not an expense. Besides, it saves the expense of spare tires, tubes, pumps, jacks, etc.

Ten Days' Free Trial

We will send Essenkay for your car—test it over the roughest roads—hill climbing—sand or mud—overload—allow it to stand loaded on a concrete floor for several days. If not convinced that it rides like air, prevents tire troubles, doubles tire mileage—return it—the test will cost you nothing.

Eggs Paid the Pastor

Mrs. Lena McBroon, Woodbury, Tenn., writes: "I've got more eggs than I ever did in my life, paid my debts, clothed the children in new dresses, and I paid my pastor his dues. I have money to spare now. 'More Eggs' is the remedy for me. I sold 42½ dozen eggs last week, set four dozen, ate some and had 1½ dozen left."

E. J. Reefer, the poultry expert, discovered the wonderful tonic "More Eggs" that revitalizes the flock and makes the hens work all the time. You need this great egg producer. It means big egg profits for you. Don't delay. Send $1 to E. J. Reefer, 7151 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., and he will send you a package of "More Eggs" tonic. A million dollar bank guarantees that if you are not absolutely satisfied your dollar will be returned on request. Send a dollar today, or send $2.25 and get 3 regular $1.00 packages on special discount for a full season's supply. Or write to Mr. Reefer for his free poultry book that tells the experience of a man who made a fortune out of poultry.—(Adv.)

A Flower for the Allies

OUT of the blackness and anguish, out of the strife and carnage, out of the loss and the suffering, what shall be our symbol of peace, of the dawn and the new day?

England has her roses, Scotland her thistle, France her lilies; but what shall we have, greater in significance and more wonderful and beautiful than all these, to hold and cement in lasting memory the union, the valor and the sacrifice of the Allies?

"In Flanders' Fields" has forever made the poppy sacred and immortal.

"In Flanders' fields the poppies blow Between the crosses, row on row."

Brave, gallant wild-flowers, flinging their banners of color out in the sunlight, and casting defiance back at the storm of bullets and crashing shells! And when night settles down, standing with bowed heads, keeping silent vigil out under the stars, over the fallen and dead.

Out of the blackness and strife we have learned that the nation that sins must die, and that the greatest good must be bought only with the greatest sacrifice. And here is our lasting reminder—"Crosses row on row."

And so on wooded hillsides, on shell-torn plains, and along the winding streams, the many graves lie scattered, which yet a mother's love has not found, nor a sister's caressing hand, nor a sweetheart's passionate touch; and to these the poppies come with sheltering step, bringing their Message of the Flowers, and whispering in the still small voice their lesson of sweetness, and beauty, and sacrifice.

And so, when, in the after years, countless pilgrims shall journey to this new and sacred Mecca, what shall be their sign manual? What token shall they carry back to other lands and to other tongues? May it not be the poppy, emblem of our Allied love and devotion, of sacrifice and lasting remembrance?

New York. LESLIE RODGER.

109 EGGS FROM 13 HENS, IN JANUARY

No Wonder Mrs. Stoetzel Likes This Plan! Figure Her Profits!

"I started feeding Don Sung the first day of January, 1918. In just one month I had received 109 eggs from 13 Plymouth Rock hens."—Mrs. Vera Stoetzel, Roseland, Neb.

Do you remember the "heatless days" and bitter zero weather last January? Probably you didn't get an egg. But you can get them, just as Mrs. Stoetzel did, by accepting this offer.

Give your hens Don Sung and watch results for one month. If you don't find that Don Sung pays for itself and pays you a good profit besides, simply tell us and your money will be refunded.

Don Sung (Chinese for egg-laying) works directly on the egg-laying organs, and is also a splendid tonic. It is easily given in the feed, improves the hen's health, makes her stronger and more active in any weather, and starts her laying.

Try Don Sung for 30 days and if it doesn't get you the eggs, no matter how cold or wet the weather, your money will be refunded by return mail. Send 50 cents today for a package by mail prepaid. Burrell-Dugger Co., 262 Columbia Bldg., Indianapolis, Ind. (Adv.)

Gave His Life for His Friend

AMONG the many heroic deaths in the great war, the passing of Second Lieutenant Wilbert W. White, Jr., son of Rev. W. W. White, president of the Bible Teachers' Training Institute, New York City, deserves to be remembered. Letters containing details of the death of the young man, who was in the American Aviation Service in France, were received in New York on November 11 from members of the squadron to which he had been attached. The first of these communications said:

"We had a sad death over the lines recently, that of Wilbert W. White, of New York. We were on a balloon strafing expedition . . . the balloon attacker, Brotherton, went on to one on the ground, leading us away from the large body of Spads supposed to protect us. We last saw Brotherton diving on this low balloon, amid a hail of machine-gun bullets. Our three planes were attacked by five Fokkers at that moment, 10 kilometers from our lines and well behind the large protecting formation of Spads. White was leading, so when a Fokker dove on Cox, a new pilot, White turned in his tracks and went back at it. . . . The Fokker kept diving on Cox as White raced back, head-on, at it, firing without effect. He must have realized that Cox would be shot down unless he put the Boche out of the fight, so he never swerved. I watched them come together, thought for a moment they would just pass side by side, but next instant off came a wing of each plane amid a cloud of splinters and shreds of fabric, and down they went spinning like tops, nose on into the ground, not fifty feet apart. . . . White was married, had two children, was to have received orders returning him to the States in a few days and knew it. But he never hesitated when he saw his duty cut out, which makes his act all the more heroic. It was his seventh official plane."

Another letter gave these additional particulars. "I suppose by now you have heard of Whitey's death. The Hun plane dove on the tail of a new man who was in the formation; Whitey swung around and headed straight for the Hun, who also kept on toward him. Neither swerved and both met head on, both losing their left wings and both crashing 3,000 meters to the ground, where they landed fifty feet apart. Whitey was the most popular fellow in the squadron, immensely liked by all. At the time of his death, Whitey had six Huns credited to him officially. His first two were at Château-Thierry, where, coming out of a cloud alone, he had the rare good luck to find two Huns in front of him, on the same level, flying in the same direction, and absolutely unconscious of his presence. He got up behind them and popped off one after the other. The next two he met down here while flying on low patrol, with only one other man, who was new. In making a turn, Whitey banked to the right and the other fellow banked to the left and lost him. The next thing he knew, there were all kinds of Huns on his tail and he beat it for home. He did not know until Whitey got back that he had shot two Huns off his tail and that he owed his life to Whitey's good work. Later on he got a balloon and another Hun, bringing his count up to six."

A letter from a third correspondent adds this information: "We lost two of our best pilots. One was White—universally known as White-ee—and a prince of a fellow he was, too. He with several others got in a scrap with a bunch of Huns. He and a Hun were coming head on, each shooting at the other; neither gave an inch, each waiting for the other to be the first to turn out, and at the last minute they came together—and of course it was all over! White-ee was my flight leader; he was a little older than most of us, and has a wife and two children somewhere in America. The toughest part is that he was slated to go back to the States for a vacation, having been here on the front almost six months; his orders were on the way through, in fact; and he had written his wife to that effect."

A statement from Washington in connection with the awarding of the Distinguished Service Order to Lieutenant White says: "For extraordinary heroism in action in the regions of Etain and Chambley, France, September 14, 1918. While protecting three Allied observation planes in the region of Etain, Lieutenant White was attacked by three Halberstadt fighters. He engaged them immediately, successfully fighting them off and leading them all away from the observation planes, which were thus permitted to carry on their work unmolested. While returning home he dived through a cloud to attack an enemy balloon near Chambley, bringing it down in flames. Two Fokker scouts then attacked him, and although he was alone, with intrepid courage he attacked the first Fokker head on, shooting until it went down into a vertical dive out of control. Pulling up sharply he fired a long burst at the second Fokker as it went over him, putting it to immediate flight."

Lieut. Wilbert W. White, Jr.

Lieutenant White began his military training at the School of Military Aeronautics, University of Toronto, September, 1917. He continued his training in the Royal Flying Corps, flying in the Canadian training squadrons at Benbrook Field, Camp Taliaferro, Tex. He received his commission as a Second Lieutenant in the Aviation Section, Signal Corps, on February 5, 1918, and was immediately assigned to an Aero Squadron, then being organized at that camp. Coming overseas with his squadron in March, he went through his advanced training on the American Flying Fields in France, and went out to the front in May. Soon afterward he was made a Flight Commander and served in such capacity till his death. He was a born leader, a favorite among the pilots and the idol of his men. His work over the front was brilliant and consistent. Being a reliable patrol leader, he could be depended upon to see everything in the air and to act with coolness and decision. He was officially credited with the destruction of four German planes and a balloon, while two more planes and another balloon were awaiting confirmation at his death. In his first combat he attacked two hostile machines single-handed, sending one down in flames and killing the pilot in the other, the machine crashing into the ground.

His death occurred on October 10, 1918. A German plane got into position to fire on a member of Lieutenant White's patrol. With characteristic courage, the latter dove straight at the Hun machine, drawing his attention from the other Allied plane. The machines collided at full speed, and the two wrecks fell to the ground.

In a letter from Wilbert White to his father, dated Fort Worth, Texas, January 26, 1918, he said: "The situatio as it now stands is that I am a qualifie cadet, temporarily and it may be permanently attached to the 147th Squadron. . . .

"Life to me now is a whole lot mor serious matter than it ever has bee before. I realize that I've something t live for, and if necessary to die for, an I'm fully prepared to do either. If Go wills that I come through this war wit my senses, I'm going to do a lot of thing I was never thinking of before . . . an if I'm not to get back—well, I will a least have given my life for the right It is a great war we're in, father, a wonderful war; a war between right an wrong, and I'm in it heart and soul t the end."

His death is a monument to his heroic spirit, for he literally sacrificed himself to save his friends, who but for Lieutenant White's courage in drawing the enemy's attack upon himself would probably both have perished.

Our Most Joyous New Year

IT IS, indeed, with a happy and grateful heart that I extend to you the season's greetings. Never before in this old world's history has there been such a cause for joy, and it is a happiness that finds its source in the realization that we are a part of the country that has become the greatest benefactor humanity has ever known—a country that stands foremost in every way—a country whose principles are synonymous with the teachings of Him in whose honor we celebrate Christmas Day.

And merged with this happiness is a great pride that our boys have adde honor to the flag, and that those wh come back have had visions that will transform their lives. Some of their comrades have made the supreme sacrifice, but they have "died to make men free," and their memories will be enshrined in our hearts.

The triumph of justice is now complete, and a new era will dawn upon the world. The anxieties incident to the war have been dispelled. Our storehouses are full of food; our industries are unimpaired; and progress and optimism must be our program.

With these blessings in mind and peace gloriously attained, our Christmas Season is surely a happy one.

And with all good wishes for the New Year, I am CHARLES F. MILLER, President.

For Instance

A YOUNG Polish girl came to the Industrial Center established by the Young Women's Christian Association in such sorrow that a leader inquired the cause. She replied that her uncle wanted to marry her, and that her father had said she must consent, and they had set the wedding day. The Y. W. C. A. leader went to the parents, hoping to convince them of the wickedness of the thing, but failed. "She makes one more to feed," they argued, "and he has money and will take her off our hands." That he was an uncle and twice the girl's age, and thoroughly disliked by her, made no difference. An appeal to the civic authorities saved the girl from the marriage, and as her home became intolerable to her she was given a home in a good family, and opportunity offered her of studying at night. She studied English and the common branches, and then stenography, and now, after three years, is private secretary, earning more in three months than her uncle earned in three years. The first thing she did after getting her first salary was to move her parents to a better home, and send her younger brothers and sisters to school. "I cannot go back and live with them," she said simply, "but through the children I hope to make the family want to live with me."

Foreign Missions After the War

A GREAT calamity, plus a great consecration, equals a great blessing. After the war, what of Foreign Missions? What all we expect? For what shall we ray? Toward what shall we work?

We who are alive today have witessed the greatest catastrophe in the istory of man since the time of the eluge. What does it all mean? Is ot this great calamity chargeable to an alone? Is it not the world's exession of our anti-Christian nature? nd its righteous ending will prove at we will to have reason and not ight sit upon the throne.

God created the earth and it was ood; God brought forth man "in his vn image" and man rebelled. God nt his Son into the world to redeem ankind through love, and as he has one so much for the human race, shall e not hope that he will bring to pass a essing that will outweigh the disaster an has brought upon himself?

In fact, is there not already taking ace in the spirit of our people a rearkable change? Think how mean d stingy and small we have been till w in our gifts to Christian and benevot purposes. In the past we gave less for reign Missions, charities and benevnces combined than we spent for ewing-gum; now, in a few months, raised for the Red Cross, Y. M. C. , Y. W. C. A. and other relief organtions more than we have given to ese or like agencies in the past huned years, practically all of it for use foreign lands.

Can such generosity be possible witht a corresponding blessing to the er? Can such effort to alleviate the etchedness and suffering of this old rld be made without creating a livand ever-growing love and desire to p the less fortunate boys and girls d men and women in the dark places the earth?

HE whole nation is beginning to look upon economy as a virtue and ste as a public crime: this should tainly result in vast accumulation the wherewithal to help others. ear ye one another's burdens" is oming a national habit. What is to God's means of expressing this great erest and love of America for the rld?

s not Christ Jesus the way? How ut his ambassadors and missiones in the field? Are they not occupy the advanced positions, and, preed by years of self-sacrificing labor, they not ready for a rapid adce all along the line? How about Headquarters Staff, the Mission ards? Are some ready, others wait and others disheartened? God ne knows and searches the hearts, will inspire and strengthen the ak-hearted and counsel and guide se who put their trust in him.

OW, after the war, this self-sacrificing, Christ-born energy will re and become partly dormant, unless re is a great wide-open channel into ich it may flow. The former vision past methods of planning are all small and denominationally conted to invite this flood-stream of ing. The people of this country are ning how to save and give five bils a year. Soon they will save two ions a year more by doing away with ng drink. What proportion of this be made to flow into Christian rities and religious work?

Vith a united effort, Foreign Mis- s might garner easily one hundred lions a year, but without coopera- nothing approaching this is pose. We might consider this large as having been willed to Foreign sions, only the provisions of the require that the different denomions get together and ask for it.

During the period of war, Christian racter has been formed at home and he trenches, and it will not be con with a purposeless existence, or sfied with merely holding on to a t Christian experience, but will see whole earth as the field, and will r its life to the great enterprise of "the world for Jesus." The full intensity of this movement may not be developed at once, but it is likely to start with such enthusiasm as to unsettle some of our leaders who are not working and praying for it.

THOUSANDS of ministers who were sent to the front have received a new baptism, and a wider view of the needs of the world and the all-sufficiency of the full Gospel to meet that need. Many of the young ministers of the future have had their experience in the trenches. Many of them have caught their first vision of the Christ in the surroundings of the battlefield. What strength they are now going to add to our religious work, and what vitalizing and purifying of our theology is sure to take place! Hundreds of thousands of our young men and women, whom we sent to France as soldiers or civilians, will make their home, for a time at least, in the Old World. It will be the first American Exodus, and will have an important effect on the work of the American Foreign Missionary Societies.

THIS is to be the great get-together age. The powers of might have united to rule the people of this earth, and the greater power of love has brought together a brotherhood which is to supplant antiquated might. How can the denominational Foreign Mission Boards fulfil their unique place in the advancing wave of Christian civilization, except by uniting their efforts as closely as possible? In fact, has not interdenominational comity advanced to the point where the time is now ripe for starting a real "get-together" movement? Certainly a workable plan is now a possibility.

It looks as if Foreign Missions would soon come into their own. In past ages hundreds of thousands of noble men and women have dedicated their lives to this work, and now the time is at hand when wealth can be induced to add its power in creating a force that will hasten the coming of that glad day when every man shall know the Lord.

Will the Mission Boards be at the front and lead in the preparation for a united effort, or have years of discouragement made them over-conservative? The present time calls for men of new consecration, new vision and new enthusiasm, for the moment must be seized and the World Cause be forced before the eyes, ears and hearts of these newly inspired Christian helpers.

Of all the religious enterprises destined to benefit by this new inspiration to save and to give, none will equal that of Foreign Missions, unless we are faithless to our opportunity.

"When the Son of Man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?"

C. C. PIERCE.

The society grew week by week, until soon the number of original members was doubled. The interest in the meetings never flagged. New lines of work for the church and new enterprises of social service were frequently suggested and adopted. The spiritual prayer-life of the young Christians grew day by day, for they remembered that they had promised "to pray and read the Bible every day." The pastor's burdens were lightened and his heart made glad. He never asked anything of his young people which they would not attempt, and being thus thoroughly organized they were able to accomplish any reasonable task.

Nearly thirty-eight years have passed since that second day of February. The pastor stayed less than three years longer before going to another field. Five honored men have succeeded him in the ministry of Williston Church, but the society has never suspended its work of proved faithfulness to its principles. The pioneer society is still active and aggressive, and is constantly and abundantly blessed of God.

The Authentic and Complete History of the War

From Authors' Foreword—"Two ideals have been before us in the preparation of this necessary work. These are simplicity and thoroughness. Thoroughness is an historical essential beyond price. So it is that official documents prepared in many instances upon the field of battle and others taken from the files of the governments at war, are the basis of this work. Maps and photographs of unusual clearness and high authenticity illuminate the text."

COLOR VIEWS of the HOLY LAND
Christian Herald Bible House New York

10 WONDERFUL VIEWS OF THE HOLY LAND

HERE is a great opportunity for you to secure ten beautiful reproductions in full color of the most famous and accurate Holy Land paintings that have ever been made. These works of a great artist have preserved to the world the Holy Land of Bible days, that country known and loved so well by our Saviour.

In the past you have known the Holy Land only through the most meager and uninspired dressings, none of them presenting this wonderful country in its true beauty and charm. Now you are offered masterpieces that put before your eyes the entire birthplace of Christianity as Christ himself knew it. For the first time ten of these views in all the beautiful tints and shades of the land itself are offered you.

Like a Visit to Palestine

As you look at these pictures you feel that you yourself stand with the artist on the slope of Olivet and look across the valley of Jehoshaphat, through which winds the old road to Samaria, and beyond, under the bright sunshine, you see the walls of Jerusalem. Through these works of art you travel the Jordan road as did our Saviour so many years ago. You visit the Pool of Bethesda, and the tomb of St. James, and feel the charm, the beauty, and the dignity of every sacred place. These reproductions are in themselves a trip to the Holy Land.

David Roberts, of the Royal Academy, made the long trip from England for the purpose of painting the most famous scenes of biblical history in order that the Christian world might have truthful pictures of the birthplace of the religion. He expressed in water-colors the scenes of Christ's life and activities, as well as many things of historical interest in Egypt and the Nile country, the very cradle of modern civilization, which he visited while on his way to Palestine. Reproductions of ten of Mr. Roberts' great paintings have been made and are now offered you in folio form. The booklet is 4½ x 9½ inches. Every picture is worthy of framing.

With each of the ten pictures goes a complete description of the scene depicted with mention of the historical and biblical interest that attaches to the place. Every student of the Bible and every person interested in the life and progress of these early days will appreciate the beauty and value of these reproductions, both as works of art and as illustrations of the great scenes in scriptural history.

CHRISTIAN HERALD SUBSCRIPTION OFFERS

"JERUSALEM—Its Redemption and Future

IT IS only now that the real story of the Redemption of Jerusalem can be told and it is that story which the Christian Herald presents in the book entitled "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future." It tells the story in vivid detail of conditions in the Holy City during the war.

The book reads like the unfolding of a vast drama, one of the grandest ever known. The redemption is not confined to Palestine, but includes all the Bible lands: Syria, Armenia, Arabia, Mesopotamia, the old country of the patriarchs, and even the "Eden Land"—the cradle of the human race. It is a volume which should be in the possession of every Christian man and woman in America, as it is plentifully illuminative of the fulfilment of God's pledge which is being brought about in a remarkable way in our lifetime. Illustrated with fifteen pages of beautiful pictures from the Holy Land.

We will send a copy of "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.00.

We will send a copy of "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.50.

"Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," separately, $1.00 per copy, postpaid.

Gene Stratton-Porter's Novels

Special Edition of Six Volumes

BY special arrangement with the publishers of Mrs. Porter's works, we procured a special edition of six volumes of the most popular stories by this talented writer. The first edition of these books was quickly taken by our readers. Another edition has just been received. The six volumes were printed from the plates used in the original edition—the type being large and clear and the paper of exceptional quality. The books are bound in fine cloth with gilt tops—twenty-five full-page illustrations.

We have only a limited number of this second edition. Those who desire this set of six volumes should order them at once.

The titles are as follows: "At the Foot of the Rainbow"; "The Harvester"; "The Girl of the Limberlost"; "Freckles"; "Laddie—A True-Blue Story"; and "Song of the Cardinal."

We will send this set of 6 volumes of Mrs. Porter's books, prepaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $5.00. Payment can be made in 5 monthly installments of $1.00 each if preferred.

"Light on Prophecy"

Report of the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY" links up the prophecies of the Bible with the great events of today and shows conclusively that we are living in an age of prophetic fulfilment. When we set out several months ago to print "Light on Prophecy," we felt that it was a book which our readers would welcome. It held something that very many good people want to know. The result, however, far exceeded our expectations. "Light on Prophecy" has now passed through four large editions, and the demand is still growing. The book contains all the notable addresses on prophecy delivered at the Philadelphia Bible Conference, which was the most important gathering of its kind ever held in this country or perhaps in the world.

We will send a copy of "Light on Prophecy," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.00.

We will send a copy of "Light on Prophecy," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.50.

"Light on Prophecy," separately, $1.00 per copy, postpaid.

Killing a Million Armenians

Ambassador Morgenthau's Revelations

AS GERMANY is now suing for peace, it is important that the world should know some things she has tried to keep secret.

This inside history and much more, all significant and breathlessly interesting, is in "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story." This book tells why the Turks killed 1,000,000 Armenians and fixes on the Germans the responsibility for the atrocities. It reveals the perfidy of Germany's attempt to start a holy war against Christians. It is the kind of a book that keeps one reading on and on. It is entertainingly written, yet it is packed full of authoritative facts. Illustrated with photographs, maps and diagrams. Over 400 pages; cloth bound.

We will send a copy of "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.50.

We will send a copy of "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us TWO NEW yearly subscriptions at $2.50 each.

"Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," separately, $2.00 a copy, postpaid.

By* Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna," etc.

"OH, MONEY! MONEY!" is a romance of a New England Cinderella and a Western millionaire. "If you don't know how to get happiness out of five dollars, you don't know how to get it out of five thousand," says Maggie, the cheery philosopher of "Oh, Money! Money!" and this is the keynote of Mrs. Porter's latest story. Out of a clear sky came three checks to the three Blaisdell families. How each family tried in its own way to get happiness from its unexpected fortune—and failed; and how Poor Maggie, without trying and without a fortune, succeeded, is told in "Oh, Money! Money!"

We will send a copy of "Oh, Money! Money!" postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.00.

We will send a copy of "Oh, Money! Money!" postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription in the Christian Herald with $2.50.

"Oh, Money! Money!" separately, $1.50 per copy, postpaid.

It may be a snug and cozy cottage, complete with five rooms on one floor, or a more pretentious bungalow of charming proportions. These types and many others are found in the Aladdin Book—complete home-building library of 100 designs—100 ideal homes. Besides this, there is a vital message for you in this most remarkable book, that will be sent at your request.

Save Lumber and Labor and You'll Save Money Building Your Home

Of course, you would like to save money building your new home—would like to build at the lowest possible price. But you cannot expect to save very much money by bargaining or getting different prices. You can only expect to save money by saving labor in building your home and eliminating waste of lumber. Aladdin Readi-Cut Houses are cut-to-fit in Aladdin Mills by Rapid Power Machines. Old-fashioned building waste is reduced from 18% to less than 2%—a saving of practically $18 on every $100 worth of lumber. And you save a third of the labor in building your home. This saving of lumber and labor will mean a large percentage of the cost of the entire building. The Aladdin Book shows you how it is done. Send for this book today.

Beautiful Book of 100 Home Plans

The Aladdin Book of Homes has a message for you. Amongst its pages, profusely illustrated in colors, leading home designs are represented to you.

Many of the homes are pictured in their natural colors, the way they are built and standing now, some place in America. Each one represents a beauty spot in the town of the Aladdin owner. This book opens the way for you to build this year. Send for it today.

Dollar-a-Knot Guarantee of Quality

Aladdin houses are cut-to-fit—no waste of lumber or labor. The Aladdin price includes all materials cut-to-fit as follows: lumber, millwork, flooring, outside and inside finish, doors, windows, shingles, lath and plaster, hardware, locks, nails, paint, varnishes. The material is shipped to you in a sealed box car, complete, ready to erect. Safe arrival of the complete material in perfect condition is guaranteed. Choicest of Hawaii's sun-ripened crop!

Libby's
Sliced
Hawaiian Pineapple

From planting to packaging produced by Libby's own experts

IN the tropical islands of Hawaii grow the sweetest, juiciest and tenderest pineapples in all the world.

But fine as they are, not all of them can meet the exacting Libby ideal of flavor and quality.

And so we keep our own experts in Hawaii. Their watchfulness begins with careful selection of the soil. It ends only when the rich slices of fruit—perfect, flawless every one—have been packaged for you in clear syrup of cane sugar.

This packaging is done in near-by Libby kitchens immediately after the fruit is picked—and the picking is done only after many months of warm Hawaiian sunshine have fully ripened the fruit.

The minute you taste Libby's Hawaiian Pineapple you'll see a difference. You'll see it in the deep, golden-yellow color of the fruit—in its juicy tenderness—in its fine texture—and, above all, in its wonderfully-fresh, honey-sweet flavor.

Have Libby's Hawaiian Pineapple for dinner tonight—see how much finer it is, how the Libby ideal has improved this most enticing and healthful of fruits.

Order a package of Libby Hawaiian Pineapple now.
Your grocer has it or will gladly get it for you.

Belgian refugees returning to their ruined homes to begin the work of reconstruction

Rebuilding the World on a New Basis

Great Political and Geographical Readjustments Secondary to Industrial, Social and Moral Reconstruction

By CHARLES GRANT MILLER

THE high mark of the flood tide of world feeling for just and secure peace was recorded by President Wilson, in his great speech at Manchester, in these words: "If the future had nothing for us but a new attempt to keep the world at a right poise by a balance of power the United States would take no interest, because she will join no combination of power which is not a combination of all of us. She is not interested merely in the peace of Europe, but in the peace of the world."

If the Peace Conference undertakes to settle all the problems that will come before it, it might outlast the century.

The Irish are there to tell their story.

The Jews are sending delegates with the very reasonable request: "Don't give freedom to countries unless you are sure it doesn't include freedom to murder Jews."

The Chinese are sending their delegates to explain that they want to run themselves—that they, also, are Allies.

Japan naturally, as one of the Allies, has her desires, too.

We daily read much about dissension between the United States and the Allies over the terms of the final peace contract. But the generous popular receptions given President Wilson in Paris and London prove conclusively that there is no fundamental discord. Great Britain, France and Italy do not disagree with America about the League of Nations. There is a political group in France that regards a League of Nations as a Utopian dream, and there is a political group in America of the same mind; but these groups are neither France nor America. It is not Italy that desires to possess herself of all the Jugo-Slav territories granted to her by the Allies in the treaty of London, but the political group headed by Sonnino; Italy does not lack leaders who are in full sympathy with all legitimate Jugo-Slav aspirations. The democratic interests of America, England, France and Italy are one. If they prevail in the Peace Congress, we may properly say that democracy has triumphed over reaction.

French Foreign Minister Pinchon expresses what is perhaps the thought of all the Allies on one most important point when he says: "We have been attacked; we want security. We have been despoiled; we demand restitution. We have been devastated; we want reparation. But that which we ask for ourselves we demand for all, and hence are closely in accord with President Wilson."

Just how this will be translated into billions in money and vast transfers of territory and sovereignty remains to be decided. But it is certain that Germany will lose all of her colonies in addition to the territory stipulated in the terms of the armistice, and otherwise be rendered helpless for future menace to peace.

RUSSIAN affairs loom larger and larger in connection with the Peace Conference. The general feeling appears to be that it will be impossible to settle the status of Germany and Poland without adopting a definite policy toward Russia. The French press controversy over the Russian Bolsheviki continues bitter. Meanwhile, the Allies feel greatly embarrassed by the absence of organization among the Russian middle-class elements, which might form the basis of a permanent government. The present intention of the Allies is to constitute a Russian committee which is to act in an informal advisory capacity whenever Russian problems arise, but this committee will have no power to participate in the deliberations of the actual Peace Conference.

The many intricate complications that are arising under the policy of according self-determination to nations, races and peoples, great and small, furnish subject for infinite conjecture, but little more than mere conjecture is as yet available.

The independence of Armenia has been proclaimed by the Armenian national delegation in Paris. The Syrians in America have appealed to President Wilson to strive for an independent Syria. The Greeks demand enlarged national rights. These are but typical of multiform demands that are constantly developing.

The political and geographical readjustments to be made by the Peace Congress, however, form by no means the larger nor the more important part of world reconstruction. Peace is empty without prosperity.

To the business men of England and of the world our President has uttered this significant sentiment:

"Good will is the foundation of trade, and trade is the great amicable instrument of the world on that account."

France, Belgium, Russia and the Balkan States, and, assuming that they have shown sufficient repentance to be assisted, Germany and Austria also, cannot hope to restore the physical well-being of their people or to rehabilitate their industries without large and continuing help. First of all, those countries will require huge quantities of food; starvation will be the fate of millions in Europe during this winter. Farm tools and machinery will have to be supplied now or in the early future, if the European harvest of 1919 is to be large enough to prevent a recurrence of starvation conditions next year. A large part of Europe will have to be clothed and shod pending the rebuilding of local factories. The destroyed homes and the ruined factories will have to be rebuilt, which means that cement, lumber, hardware and the hundred other materials which enter into building construction will have to be brought in from outside countries. The industrial plants that are thus to be repaired and rebuilt, as well as those which have depreciated through four long years of continuous and hard usage, will have to be equipped with machinery, and they will have to be supplied with the necessary raw materials of manufacture.

THE heart of the after-war business and financial problem will be found in the price situation. This idea was elaborated by A. C. Miller, member of the Federal Reserve Board, before the American Academy of Political and Social Science. He pointed out that a great opportunity awaits the country first to be able to begin marking down

The Story of Syria's Desolation

How Hundreds of Thousands Died of Hunger and Pestilence
The Tragedy as an Eyewitness Saw It

Distributing flour to refugees in Urumiah

IT IS quite certain that, in Syria at least, almost every man can speak of the horrors of the great World War from his own experiences, either as a fighting soldier or as a civilian, for each had to pass through some hard time. But I believe the experiences of the Armenians and Syrians are the most pathetic and touching of all, being both the direct effect of the war, together with what the Turkish Government did to increase these horrors. Most of these experiences are such that only strong-hearted persons can bear to hear them related.

I have just arrived in Jerusalem from Damascus, and I thought your Christian Herald readers might like to hear something of our country, which you have long been so generously helping. The Herald was the first paper of the West to come into my hands, after the fall of Damascus and my return to Jerusalem. I am a native of Jerusalem, and a graduate of the American College of Beirut, where I spent two years as instructor, prior to the outbreak of the war. I served eighteen months in the ranks and then left to go back to Beirut, to the Medical School. Recently I came from Damascus, where I witnessed the historical event of the occupation of the oldest city in the world by the victorious British forces. But what I shall tell now is simply of Beirut, although the same experience, if not on a larger scale, was common throughout Syria. Now that communication with the world is restored, I wish to assure your people of the West, who have been helping our poor and needy, of the fine work the American Red Cross is doing in relieving suffering and helping those in distress. Both Armenians and Syrians suffered cruelly at the hands of the Turks. The Armenians rose against the oppressors and fought in the ranks of their enemies, but the poor Syrians simply died in their homes, of starvation and disease. They did not raise a stick against the Turks, although the latter put to death many of the native notables and chiefs of the country.

The causes of all this misery are many and vary in character. To begin, you must remember that the inhabitants of Mount Lebanon are a very hard-working race, depending for support largely on the money they get from the West, for many of their young men are out there working and sending home money. With Turkey going into war, this source of income stopped immediately. Then, for the second year in succession, the country was devastated by the locusts, which ravaged it so badly that in many places nothing of verdure or even of plantations was left. Of course, they destroyed all the mulberry trees, on which the people depended for their silk industry, and also the grapevines, which are also a source of income to many.

Then came the Turkish paper money, and its depreciation to almost one-fifth of its face value. Big merchants did not accept it, or if they did they would take it for one-fifth of its face, and this brought great misery on the working class and to the government employees who worked a full month for 200 or 400 piasters, which would realize only two or four dollars, on which meager sum the worker and his family had to exist for a month! Then, of course, the government never tried to help the poor. It is said that a party waited on Jamal Pasha and asked him for some wheat to be distributed to the poor.

"What!" cried Jamal coarsely, "are the Lebanese still living? Has not the mother eaten her child yet?"

What would you think of such words spoken by the commander-in-chief and administrator of a country? Americans tried to help the poor by distributing some wheat and giving work to some of the men, but they were stopped by the government.

The winter seasons were very severe. The price of food was very high. Imagine six pounds of flour sold for three pounds sterling! What would a man with a family have to do? The price of bread was always getting higher and higher, from 100 to 200, to 250 and to 300 piasters! A pair of boots of French leather cost fifteen pounds sterling, and a suit of clothes thirty pounds!

Disease prevailed everywhere. In the winter of the third year it reached its climax. The average dying daily of typhus was somewhere between 80 and 130 in the vicinity of Beirut alone. Cold weather, with no shelter and little or no food, did a great deal for the spread of it. The poor creatures coming to beg at the doors would drop vermin and thus infect the dwellers. Typhus prevailed everywhere and among every class and sect. Medicines and drugs were very expensive and only rich people could afford to pay for them.

Many people used to make a living by stealing the clothes of the dead, or even the wood of the coffins, and these also were causes of the spread of many diseases. Men would find the clothes of their deceased relatives and friends worn by others, and upon questioning them, would learn that they had been stolen from the graves. Hundreds of poor, homeless Lebanese acted as scavengers on the rubbish dunes in the streets of Beirut. They used to spend their nights in the cold, in the mud and und the rain. Can you imagine chi dren of two or four years livin day and night on practicall nothing? Thousands of old me and women thronged tne street seeking food. It was a commo sight to see young women carrying their children on their arms running here and there, begging I have seen mothers throwin their children away and leavin them, and have heard some say "How can we see our childre die before us of hunger? We' rather have them away from ou sight." The government ha men appointed to pick the dea off the streets and it was a sa daily sight to see them going about, picking here one, ther another.

The authorities tried to lessen the horrors in the city of Beirut, and decided that the Lebanese should go and die in their homes and villages. For this reason i ordered the policemen and gendarmes to gather them and send them up to the mountain. They would go, but when darkness came on, they would creep back and could be seen the next day in the streets, fighting for bread. Again they would be driven off, and again they would return.

I have seen many a time boys snatching bread from persons who carried it, and devouring a whole loaf in a few mouthfuls. The men would follow them and beat them, but the poor creatures would say—and I have heard them—"Strike us, kill us! It is enough that we have eaten some bread!" I have seen boys, men and women dead in the streets, and others dying. I have seen homeless children of two and three years of age feeding on the grain they picked from the manure heaps and house rubbish. I saw one boy accompanying his mother, passing the city square, when suddenly the boy fell unconscious. A policeman who happened to be near by hurried to the spot, whip in hand, and ordered the mother to take away her child. The mother was anxiously trying to ascertain if he were still alive. The policeman got angry and struck the dying boy, saying "If you are alive, then up with you, or else die quickly." I watched the poor mother in her distress, trying to wake her dead child by calling him endearing names. The officer grew impatient and struck the mother, saying, "Carry him away," and the poor woman begged him to be patient. The boy, however, was dead.

Many villages on Mount Lebanon were closed, with none to tell the fate of their people, and the keys were handed over to the central government. It is estimated by authorities that Mount Lebanon alone lost between one hundred thousand and one hundred and fifty thousand souls from hunger and disease during these four years of war!

The Americans in Beirut did excellent work. They opened three free kitchens in the mountain villages, and distributed money and wheat to the starving sufferers. The work done by Mr. Dodge and Dr. Dray in helping to feed the poor, homeless children can never be forgotten, and has gained the praise of everybody. They would have done more, had they been encouraged by the government. M. M. HANNUSH.

prices toward peace levels. Prices must be reduced, he said, and in order to do so deflation of credit and currency must be accomplished. In order to substitute deflation for present inflation, greater production must ensue and great savings be made. Twelve billion dollars must be saved by the American people before the present inflation can be said to be removed, and before prices will become anything like normal, he said.

How is Europe going to meet its indebtedness to us? It is a difficult problem. There is one solution however, that would be extremely easy, but which will meet with little general approval. The easiest way for France or England would be to sell to this country some of their transatlantic possessions. This would be equivalent to allowing a part of the collateral behind a loan to be used to liquidate the loan. Otherwise, it seems obvious that America will remain a creditor nation for many years to come.

The whole situation has been changed as far as the United States is concerned. We now have a big mercantile marine and will do a large part of the carrying trade formerly done in English, German and French bottoms. We used to pay those nations heavy freight charges, but now the balance will be in our favor. We have organized many big insurance companies in place of German-controlled companies—in short, we have greatly reduced the yearly tribute which we used to pay to foreign nations.

The whole world has been going without things it is accustomed to buy. Clothing, machinery and equipment are worn out, houses are out of repair, new building has been almost at a standstill, roadways are neglected, automobiles are worn and depreciated, neutral countries everywhere have been unable to import, a large percentage of the world's ships have been sunk.

Construction enterprises of both public and private nature, which have been in abeyance for a couple of years or more, will call for the employment of hundreds of thousands of men. The great shipbuilding plants —an entirely new industry—will continue in full blast. Work for foreign reconstruction will also require the services of all kinds of handicraftsmen, and the need of clothing in different foreign countries will help keep busy the textile mills, shoe factories and other establishments.

In many directions, also, there will still be a large government demand for some time to come. So far as our war costs continue, that will mean a continued demand for goods, since it is for that purpose that the money is necessary. The Shipping Board has announced that it will carry through its program of ship construction. Our soldiers must be clothed and fed until they are demobilized. Further loans to our allies will be chiefly, if not entirely, to enable them to make purchases here. As the war demand dwindles the peace demand should grow.

THEN, too, there is another aspect of the labor situation. In normal times it was necessary to keep getting new human working material from abroad in order to meet the growing needs of the country. This immigration has virtually ceased. In the year 1914 more than 1,200,000 foreigners came here, and there was no difficulty in absorbing them.

Secretary of Labor Wilson says that "it is more than likely that 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 who went away to war will drop back into industrial pursuits without more than a ripple of idleness."

ident and Mrs. Wilson leaving the ch Academy following the investiture larshal Joffre with the rank of Academician

THE man who seeks nothing for himself except the privilege of serving others holds a unique weapon and speaks with unusual er when facing differences of opinion h all agree must be brought into an rd. When President Wilson set for France there was a practical ement between England, France, United States and Italy as to the principles of peace with some of unity as to individual points. is first week in Paris, the President reported to have achieved a close erstanding with Premier Clemenceau the French statesmen, while inter-s with the Italian king and premier reported to have made a beginning a satisfactory solution to the vexed stion raised by the conflict between ancient aims of Italy and the rations of the new state of Jugo-ia. Upon the question of freedom the seas, Wilson and Clemenceau said to be agreed, while both were rted as committed to the League of ions.

fter the President left Paris, how-, and while he was in the midst of conferences with the statesmen of t Britain, Premier Clemenceau, in ddress to the Chamber of Deputies ecember 30—an address which won a vote of confidence by 380 to 184—e it plain that he was in agreement Great Britain on the question of freedom of the seas, and declared in this attitude he had the approval resident Wilson. In general, his ess indicated the completeness of accord between the four leading ons of the Entente, but he threw a bshell into the ranks of those who convinced themselves that the stions were all settled. In discussing League of Nations, he declared his iance to the old system of alliances d the "balance of power." Mr. son upon the same day, at Man-ter, declared that the United States was for the League of Nations, provided it included all, and distinctly declared his lack of confidence in the old principle of the "balance of power."

President Wilson returned to Paris on December 31 and, after a quiet New Year's Day, left in the evening for Rome. He traveled in King Victor Emmanuel's royal train and was met at the Italian border by the Duke of Lante representing the king. The progress of the train from the frontier toward Rome was made through brilliant sunshine, which must have been a great relief after two weeks of rain and heavy skies. Everywhere the train was cheered along its route by the swiftly gathering crowds, while the snowcapped western Alps stood guard along the route.

The President and Mrs. Wilson arrived in Rome at 10.25 A. M. on January 3. They were met at the station by King Victor Emmanuel and Queen Helena. The procession from the station to the Quirinal was headed by veterans of the war, with a company of American veterans leading. The American band received the President with the strains of the "Star-Spangled Banner." After the usual courtesies had been exchanged between the President, the King and the Queen Mother Margherita, the President was received by the Italian Parliament, after which the King gave a state dinner, this being followed by a visit to the President. In the evening that ancient boon, the citizenship of Rome, was conferred upon Mr. Wilson.

His first formal speech in Italy was made in the afternoon in the Chamber of Deputies to the Italian Parliament. In this speech the President happily recognized the concord in friendship uniting the Italian and American nations, and took occasion to express himself again regarding the "balance of power," which he said had been found wanting, "for the best of reasons, that it does not remain balanced inside itself." He declared that in the past great empires had been maintained by force of arms, but that the world was to be rebuilt upon a basis of friendship, and that friendship alone should be the power to hold nations together. "Therefore," he said, "our task at Paris is to organize a friendship of the world, to see to it that all the moral forces that make for right and justice and liberty are united and are given a vital organization to which the people of the world will readily and gladly respond."

In this speech Mr. Wilson thus sketched the age-long struggle for liberty:

"That spirit of liberty seems to have caught with each age the characteristic purpose of the age. This imperial people now gladly represents the freedom of nations. This people, which at one time seemed to conceive the purpose of governing the world, now takes part in the liberal enterprise of offering the world its own government. Can there be a finer or more impressive illustration of the indestructible human spirit, and of the unconquerable spirit of liberty? . . .

"Men have pursued liberty sometimes like a mirage that seemed to elude them, that seemed to run before them as they advanced, but never have they flagged in their purpose to achieve it, and I believe that I am not deceived in supposing that in this age of ours they are nearer to it than they ever were before. The light that shined upon the summit now seems to shine almost at our feet, and if we lose it, it will only be because we have lost faith."

The progress of the President and Mrs. Wilson through the streets of Rome was another triumphant procession between lines of cheering people, through streets brilliant with bunting, under cloudless Italian skies in brilliant sunshine. Airplanes soaring overhead bombed the city with greetings from the sky to the guests and the King; and people of Italy acclaimed him as, "the proclaimer of the rights and liberty of peoples."

Saturday, January 4, was a busy day for President Wilson. He took an auto ride about the city of Rome, saw the evidences of its one-time power and beauty and of its present power and energy, was made a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences, called on the Pope at the Vatican and received prominent Protestants and representatives of all American Protestant missions in Rome at the American Episcopal Church.

During their tour of Rome, as the Presidential party was entering the Roman Forum, a noted archeologist, Professor Giacomo Boni, presented the President with branches of laurel and myrtle, offering these symbols of victory to him as the upholder of freedom and civilization of peoples.

In between events the President had many conferences with the Italian King, Foreign Minister and Premier, the subjects and results of which were not announced. Mr. Wilson left Rome at 9.00 P. M. on the 4th, and the special correspondent of the New York Times reported that the President left the Imperial City convinced that the enthusiastic popular demonstrations which had followed him across three nations marked approval of the people of his policies and their desire for a settlement of the war which will make impossible another conflict.

President Wilson's trip from Rome to Paris was another triumphal progress. In Genoa and Milan and in Turin he was received by crowding, cheering throngs, which testified to the affection which the Italian people held for him and which was expressed in the shout, "Viva Wilson, God of Peace!"

Roosevelt's Great Career Is Closed

Theodore Roosevelt

THEODORE ROOSEVELT, former President of the United States and one of the most picturesque and forceful figures ever known in American public life, passed away at his home, Sagamore Hill, at Oyster Bay, N. Y., shortly after four o'clock on the morning of January 6.

A complication of diseases, born of an exploring expedition into the wilds of South America, is believed to have been the cause of death. During the past eighteen months he had been treated by the foremost surgeons and medical men of the country, but the malady baffled their skill. The death of his youngest son, Quentin, in an air battle in France, had affected him deeply.

Mrs. Roosevelt and a nurse were with him when the end came.

Colonel Roosevelt had suffered a new attack of inflammatory rheumatism on New Year's Day and had been more or less confined to his room since.

COL. ROOSEVELT'S career has left such a vivid impression upon the people of his time that it is necessary to touch but briefly upon some of the more striking phases of his varied interesting and "strenuous life" to recall to the public mind full details of his many exploits and experiences.

He had more staunch friends and more bitter enemies than any other man in American politics. But Col. Roosevelt's enemies agreed with his friends that his life, his character and his writings represent an eminently high type of Americanism.

Called to the White House in 1901, after President McKinley had been assassinated, Col. Roosevelt, forty-two years of age, became the youngest President the United States has ever had. Three years later he was elected President by the largest popular vote a President has received. At the height of his public and political career, during the four years of the presidency for which he had been elected, Roosevelt accomplished achievements which historians will rank high in the international and industrial progress of the country. They included his influential negotiations which effected peace at Portsmouth, N. H., between Russia and Japan; maintenance of the Monroe doctrine at a period when European powers were interested in the affairs of Venezuela; the recognition of Panama as a republic and his treaty with Panama, by which the interoceanic canal was put under way.

Roosevelt after leaving the White House devoted his life largely to literary work, hunting and exploration. He became contributing editor to the "Outlook" in 1909, continuing this for five years, and later held editorial positions with the "Metropolitan" and the Kansas City "Star."

From 1882 to 1917 he published about fifty volumes of works covering the wide range of naval history, hunting, biography, the Rough Riders, Americanism, nationalism, conservation of womanhood and childhood, animals, exploration, the World War and America's participation in it, and his autobiography. His hunts for big game and his zest for exploration took him into the American West, the heart of Africa and the wilderness of Brazil.

Upon his return from his African journey—a return during which he made triumphant entries into European capitals and was received by nations' rulers, including the Emperor of Germany—he arrived in New York in 1910, to experience what was conceded to be the greatest ovation an American private citizen was ever accorded by the people of his country.

At the head of an exploring party in South America in 1914 he discovered and followed for 600 miles a Madeira River tributary which the Brazilian Government subsequently named, Reo Theodoro.

During this journey the ex-President contracted a jungle fever which was held indirectly responsible for the abscesses which developed malignantly and required several recent operations.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT, besides being a prolific writer, lectured and made public speeches extensively, not only in his own country but in England, Spain, South America and other parts of the world. The facility with which he made political enemies and followers made him a marked man both the bitter and friendly attention of cartoon and paragraphers. Quaint and picturesque phr were coined liberally by him and by others concern him. "Speak softly and use the big stick," "we words," "pussyfoot," "mollycoddle" and "my is in the ring" were some of the Rooseveltian exp sions which attained wide publicity.

When the European war began Roosevelt vig ously advocated a policy of national preparedn urging universal military training for the nati youth. In speeches throughout the country and his magazine and newspaper writings he critici severely the policies of President Wilson, urg America's duty to render active support to the Ente

With the United States a belligerent, Roose vainly endeavored to obtain the consent of the W Department to establish an army division which was anxious to take to France. His four sons his son-in-law, Dr. Derby, entered the service. Th dore, Jr., became a major and Archibald a capt both in France; Quentin entered a French aviat squadron, and Dr. Derby the medical service, both in France. Kermit failing to pass a phys examination which would admit him to the Uni States Army, received a commission in the Brit army and was soon in Mesopotamia. Quentin killed.

THE Roosevelt forebears had been prominen not illustrious—in the affairs of New York 200 years. His father was Theodore Roosevelt philanthropist, an establisher of newsboys' lodg houses, an earnest member of the Young Me Christian Association, one of the chief organizers the United Charities and a friend and helper of Union soldiers in the Civil War. President Roo velt's mother was Martha Bullock, of Georgia.

Theodore Roosevelt was born in New York Ci on October 27, 1858. He was a weakly boy. very ill health forced him out of doors, to take s tematic exercise, to love the overcoming athl which he himself could not at that time become, hate a mollycoddle. His actual conquest of g health had a potent effect on Roosevelt's charact more than his inheritance, it made him an admire strength and manliness and of robust accompli ment. The invalid boy, converted at last into strong man, became passionate in his admiration strength.

Theodore Roosevelt did not have the inestima advantage for an American of his type of educati in the public schools. He was prepared for college private schools, and sent thence direct to Harva University, where he graduated in 1880.

A few months after his graduation Roosev married Miss Alice Lee, of Boston. She died 1884, leaving one child, Alice, now the wife of Rep sentative Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio. In Roosevelt married Miss Edith Kermit Carow, New York, and to them five children were bor

ON NEW YEAR'S morning at three o'clock the American transport Northern Pacific went ashore off Fire Island on the south shore of Long Island. The big ship had lost her reckoning in a dense fog and had grounded on a wide sandbar about 300 yards off shore from a strip of sand known as Lonely Island. The Northern Pacific had on board 2,973 returning soldiers and sailors, most of them wounded, 269 of them bedridden. A considerable surf was running, but it soon developed that she was resting easily and was in no immediate danger of breaking up. Her wireless call brought almost immediate assistance from the Coast Guard, but it was ten hours after she grounded before attempts succeeded to get a line fast to her. The Navy department despatched a fleet of destroyers and tugs from New York harbor under the lead of the Cruiser Columbia. The Hospital ship Solace accompanied the fleet. These ships anchored about a mile off shore. Attempts were to be made on the morning of the second, however, to pull the ship off and, because of this and the difficulty of embarking wounded men in small boats tossed in the rough seas, no attempt was made to get the men off on Wednesday. Nevertheless the Red Cross and the Woman's Motor Corps, the Army Hospital Service and the Coast Guard, beside many civilians kept vigil on the beach all day, ready to render aid if needed. The Red Cross supplied coffee for the watchers.

A CHANCE DETECTIVE

A Short Story of War Patriotism

By Annie Hamilton Donnell

AT EVERY separate step—and there were so many steps—she seemed to hear again those cruel words. They seared themselves into Ardelia Blinn's soul—the sting of the branding-iron was quivering torture.

was not so much that she found out herself that she old as that the world had d it out. She was dis- red, exposed, stripped of gallant little make-believe. had said that she would not be old, she ld not, but they had said she was already. as not then a thing to be dreaded but ured.

'ill death do us part—me and it,” panted rdelia, mounting her stairs. It was only natural be expected—that the act of mounting should ust like this. Since—since she had grown old. delia was little and thin and eager—a creature e for eternal youth, for love and the adventures fe. To be set among friends in pleasant sunny es, not here at the top of these weary stairs among ngers, in the piteous solitude of a great city. setting of Ardelia was wrong—a mistake had made somewhere.

ull and lonely before and a little tired of life, reat war had wakened her, set her pulses tingling, very soul beating with the world's pain. She suddenly a live Ardelia, yearning for her “bit” o. She was hungry with the emptiness of soul demanded the food of labor, work for her try—a chance with the rest. There was prob- in all the big city no more fervent a patriot than lia.

R days she had wrested with the shyness of one who lives alone at the top of many stairs. Then ad taken her plunge. She had presented herself e of the centers of activity where earnest women hite uniforms sat at long tables in the sight of ers-by. Ardelia had been a passer-by and had red to watch the white workers with wistful . Again and again she had tried to open the and go in there, but the dread of facing so many of eyes had pulled her back. But she had known in the end she would go in. Once, in her attic , she had draped her head in a white towel and ied herself in her glass.

look like them,” she had exulted. And the day she had opened the door and gone in. nearly a week Ardelia had been “like them,” ng at a long table, feverishly working, folding tender heart into her bandages. It had been a intense, palpitating world to Ardelia Blinn for e days that made nearly a week. She had ed straighter on her way to work with light, st running feet, as if there were a terrible need urry. It was good to hurry to her work! The she passed on her way were more her flags now; was enlisted under them.

en she had overheard the cruel words. That today, a little while ago. Could it be a little e? She had been taking off her uniform and ne had noticed that she, the one they were ng about, was there. The brisk, capable worker the floating blue veil of honor had said the words: My dear, I have to fold every last one of them after she goes! That little pathetic thing that came in a day or two ago—sits at the side wall- —you know. She's too old, but I can't bear to her felings by telling her so. She probably t see plainly enough, or her fingers are stiff,—her won't do at all. And it's so much harder to do over than to do it in the first place! If the old le would just—knit!”

RDELIA mounted her last stair and opened the door into her little sky-parlor. She made herself before she took off her hat. Making tea was a time-filler, if one went through the stages very ly, and the tea itself would be good for a “pa- ic little thing.” Ardelia smiled twistedly, but did drink the tea; it cooled dejectedly in its thick ent cup.

hat woman in the floaty blue veil had been kind. lia remembered now how many times she had ently explained and suggested. A kind woman is not cruel, who doesn't expect to be overheard.

“It's life—life's cruel,” sighed poor Ardelia. “Letting folks grow old. Especially,” she added, with dreary truth, “folks that haven't a soul o' their own to grow old along with.” All her gray years that stretched behind—all that stretched ahead—shut her into her utter loneliness.

Ardelia was marooned on the desolate shores of old age.

Then because she was Ardelia Blinn, worthy successor to a long line of courageous Blinns who had stood up against life, Ardelia stood up now. Literally. With the unemptied cup in one hand she got to her feet and with her unoccupied hand gallantly saluted the tiny flag stuck into her mirror. A new and brisk Ardelia who might have been in uniform, standing there,—an undaunted veteran of life.

“I'll serve you yet!” flashed she. “They can't keep me from serving my flag! Forward, march!” Actually now she was laughing. She drank the cooled tea as if it were a toast to her country as represented by that tiny flag—two “toasts” Ardelia drank. She was no longer conscious of loneliness and creeping age. Tomorrow she would find another way to serve.

“It's amazing,” cried Ardelia aloud, “how two cups of tea do set a body up,” but it was not cups of tea. “Now, while my supper's warming over the lamp I'll carry back those socks.” Goodness, suppose he'd taken in his wash! The old panic seized Ardelia, to get the mended socks back on to the bit of line stretched between chimneys on the roof. She was in terror of some day being discovered. And socks were not the worst. Shirts! A sorry old nightshirt!—She was guilty of those, too. She had found them appealingly dangling (no man could hang out clothes) when she carried her own little wash to the roof to dry. Very stealthily and hurriedly had Ardelia whisked them down to her room and patched and darned them, beautifully unconscious of the imperfection of her poor dim-sighted work. It had not occurred to Ardelia that her mysterious attic neighbor might have mended “every last one of them over” afterward, like the lady in the blue veil of honor at the white room of bandages.

“I ought to have hung 'em back this noon, to be real safe, but I only discovered that hole in the leg the last minute. I wasn't going to hang a hole back!” She got out her work-box now, to tackle the hole in the leg, hurrying nervously to thread her needle. Threading needles was always rather a hopeless task to Ardelia. Some virtue appeared to have gone out of Aunt Mercy Blinn's glasses the last year or two, since she had adopted them from her little store of inherited Aunt-Mercies. They made sad work of needles and thread.

ARDELIA and her Attic Neighbor had never met. At least, as Ardelia said, you could not really call seeing him through a crack in the door, or hearing the creep-creep of his rubber-soled shoes in the hall, or hanging and unhanging his socks on a clothesline meeting. She did not even know if he were short or tall, thin or thick—but Ardelia was fond of her Attic Neighbor. The fondness of company across the hall, in a dreary attic,—the gentle endearing influence of friendshipping with his socks and shirts. She pitied his loneliness because she knew what loneliness was; she warmed to him because he was a man, only a man. When she treated herself on rare occasions to little chocolate-frosted tea-cakes, she longed to share them with the Attic Neighbor—once she had gone so far as to leave one, wrapped in tissue, on his doorsill, but had pattered noiselessly over in her bare feet in the middle of the night, to get it again. She had blushed in the pitch blackness because suddenly leaving tea-cakes—a tea-cake—on a masculine doorsill had seemed so—immoral to Ardelia. If she had known it, she had come the nearest-of-all then to “meeting” the Attic Neighbor, descending quietly from the roof.

He spent much time upon the roof, if she had known. Once in her gentle prowling after socks with holes she had seen him sitting against one of the chimneys, too intent on his own occupation to be suspicious of hers. Her heart had leaped with pity when she saw what he was doing, for it spoke so eloquently of his loneliness. Poor man, sitting there gazing so eagerly through his spy-glass toward some distant home! As she, Ardelia, might have gazed if she had had a distant home. Just to look toward, sighed gentle old Ardelia—it would have been a comfort. She had even rummaged out of Aunt Mercy Blinn's chest the sea-glass of Capt' Blinn's and tried sitting against a chimney, herself, peering out over the harbor—toward. Vague plaintive thoughts had come to her with the vagueness of her view, for she had not seen much but a waste of sea. Uncle Mercy's glass might have had troubles kindred to the spectacles of Aunt Mercy, for they failed to reveal the distant items of interest visible through the Attic Neighbor's “spy-glass.” If Ardelia could have looked through that—“Poor man, I suppose that's why he lives up top o' things an' down near the harbor, here,—so's he can look towards his home somewhere out there to sea. He's homesick, poor man!” And tenderness was added to Ardelia's thoughts of the Attic Neighbor. She carried down a moist and ragged shirt that day and mended it with compassionate little patches.

THE day after Ardelia had overheard the Blue Veil lady's unintentionally cruel speech, she started forth on her new quest for service. This time it was to a big, busy room full of sewing-machines and sewing women, all making warm garments for the boys Over There. Ardelia quietly proffered her services and was given a soft heap of gray stuff, bewilderingly pinned and creased. Here she was to baste—here turn up inch hems—here make buttonholes. For long hours Ardelia basted and turned up and buttonholed. Her soft, sagging old cheeks were flushed with fatigue when the day was over. But the next day she gallantly returned and asked for her own particular gray heap.

“I didn't quite finish all the buttonholes yesterday,” she said. She had forgotten weariness and stiffness in the warm, good feeling of being one of these busy workers. “After I've got this piece all done I can start another one. It's pretty cloth to sew on, isn't it?”

“Yes, it's soft—you might make one of these cheesecloth handkerchiefs today, Mrs.—er——”

“Blinn—Miss. But I'd sort of like to work on the gray,” explained Ardelia eagerly. Then she looked up and caught the interchange of looks between two of the workers. There was in those looks what there had been on the others, the Blue Veil lady's, lips. Just as cruel and just as unintentionally so.

“You mean,” Ardelia said quietly, “that you had to take my gray work out an' do it over? It must have been kind of hard to rip out the buttonholes. I'll —I'll try a handkerchief. If they're plain running —I ought to be able to plain run.”

BUT plain running through Aunt Mercy Blinn's glasses and Ardelia Blinn's tears, combined, did not prove a simple matter, though Ardelia hid the tears and tried splendidly to hide her stitches. The work went very badly and she ripped it out again and again. She sat in a panic of ripping out, not daring to glance up lest she interrupt more looks. At noon her companionship with the roomful of busy workers ended. Ardelia gently bade them good-bye.

On the way back to her attic she stopped at three places and priced spectacles, but the calm assurance of the bland clerks that they would be “only ten dollars,” not counting, of course, the fee of the examining eye-specialist—no, certainly not, they never did that part themselves—so alarmed Ardelia

Our Christian Herald Family Grows

THE Christian Herald began the new year with the largest subscription receipts in its history. We desire to express to our great army of subscribers our sincere appreciation of their confidence in what we are doing.

The response to our subscription offers during and after Christmas week was simply overwhelming, causing a congestion in our subscription department that we could not overcome. Our clerical force, although augmented by additional help and working overtime, was unable to fill each day all the orders received that day. There will therefore be a delay in sending out books ordered, and in getting subscriptions on our records. We want to assure every member of the largely increased Christian Herald Family that we are doing our utmost, and hope to get caught up on all orders very soon.

Please do not worry if the books you ordered do not arrive exactly on the day anticipated. Wait a reasonable time before writing us about it. Inquiries require special handling, and necessitate using a portion of our clerical force that could otherwise be employed in filling regular subscription orders.

Preparing for Versailles

PRESIDENT WILSON has touched the heart of France with his earnest advocacy of unity of spirit between the two great republics. He has stirred the soul of England as it has not been stirred in a century or more. In the pursuit of his laudable purpose of having unity at Versailles, he has gone to Italy with the same arousing gospel of unity of nations. And now, world attention turns towards Versailles, where this week the delegates assemble in what must be regarded as incomparably the most important event of its kind in history.

Of the program of the Conference very little can now be said. Justice and Mercy will sit side by side, and aid its decisions—Justice until the last wrong is redressed and until the criminals and arch-plotters who caused the needless sacrifice of 6,000,000 lives to gratify the lust for world-power are fitly punished; mercy until the weaker nations who have been oppressed and despoiled and made a plaything and a mockery by an unrighteous civilization are lifted up, their wounds healed, their wants supplied, and their future safety and protection assured.

If the Christ-spirit rules the Conference, there will be no selfish or disrupting jealousies among its members. As President Wilson in his recent address at the Guildhall in London said: "The Conference must not only make the settlements just, but it must see that they remain and are observed, and that honor and justice prevail in the world," also that "a single, overwhelming, powerful group of nations shall be the trustee of the peace of the world." It seems but yesterday that the "concert of power" was a familiar phrase in international statesmanship. Yet that concert proved an illusive thing, and wars were waged, territory stolen, weak races ruthlessly robbed of their rights, treaties broken, massacres perpetrated, the "concert of power" being impotent to avert these things. Now, however, the intelligence and humanity of all the peoples have been quickened to understand the practicability and the imperative need of the League of Nations as the foundation of the world's hope of permanent peace. This is what our President has felicitously called the final or crowning enterprise of humanity. He found the leading statesmen in both Britain and France already impressed with the conviction that such a League was the true guarantee of enduring peace, and this he regarded as the most reassuring thing that has ever happened in the world.

One of the strongest advocates of the League of Nations is Lord Robert Cecil, of England. Speaking in behalf of his government, he said: "We know now the horrors of war. A year from now the old glamour may return. We must guard against this possibility. The League of Nations must have a broader purpose than merely the prevention of wars. It must have administrative powers as well as the authority to settle disputes." Unquestionably, the League of Nations will not be the mushroom growth of a night. To construct it with sufficiently solid foundations is a task that may call for weeks and even months. The Conference may lay only the substructure now, the whole taking form slowly and calling for additional labor from year to year.

There is still the possibility that in the Conference unforeseen causes may arise to delay the work. If such exist, they have not yet disclosed themselves; but if they should come to the surface and prove to be rooted in jealousies that would render the task difficult, the United States would still be in a commanding position, able to carry through the plan of building the biggest navy of any power in the world. President Wilson has clearly indicated that this was the alternative. We have both the money and the material for such a task, and this fact alone may prove one of the strongest arguments in bringing about an agreement among the Allied powers in favor of the League. We trust, however, that such an argument will not be needed to convince the representatives at Versailles of the peoples of England, of France, and of Italy of the wisdom and necessity of giving their approval to the League of Nations. Therefore, we repeat that if the spirit of Christ prevail, dissension cannot enter, and the Conference will be agreeable to carry through its mighty task of assuring the world's peace without material hindrance.

Underrating the Enemy's Strength

MORAL lessons of priceless value are coming to us from the war. Spiritual analogies in the life of the individual Christian are abundant. Amongst them none are of greater import than the truth that in warfare it is always a calamity to underrate the strength of the enemy.

Germany, with all its boasted efficiency, made this ghastly and egregious blunder over and over again. It is perfectly clear now that it was Germany's great misfortune to be under the domination of a colossal blunderer. That poor pitiful miscreant who is hiding in Holland today was, in his own estimation, a few months ago almost on an equality with God Almighty. Yet he blundered. He never dreamed that Belgium would stand up and fight. He never thought that England, with a standing army of merely 180,000 men—"Sir John French's comtemptible little army," as he called them—could withstand Germany's mighty hosts. And America! He would "stand no nonsense from America!" America was three thousand miles away. American troops could never get across the Atlantic. If they could and did, what did they know about fighting? We know now that this is one of the chief reasons why the great, efficiently organized and superbly prepared German army has been so thoroughly beaten and crushed.

St. Paul says in Ephesians 6:12, "We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against spiritual wickedness in high places." The mightiest foes the individual Christian has to contend with are not the visible, tangible forms of evil in the world, but those shadowy, impalpable spirits that sweep down upon him unawares from the unseen world. Evil thoughts that suddenly take possession of his mind, unholy passions that surge within his heart, inflamed desires, ignoble cravings, vast cohorts of evil under the direction of "the prince of the power of the air," these are the forces which the Christian has to dread most, and to meet them he requires "the whole armor of God."

A Prognosticator's Look Ahead

IN THESE times, so big with events coming in rapid succession, it is not surprising to find a modern school of prognosticators—we should never call them prophets—who are ready to forecast what lies before us during the year that is still young. Many will recall the forecasts of Zadkiel, whose predictions appeared regularly in the English periodicals in a past and gone generation. There were French and Italian prognosticators, too, who, if we may believe them, consulted the stars, cast horoscopes of kings and premiers, and made shrewd guesses as to wars and politics, which usually accommodated themselves to any desired interpretations. And now an American forecaster, claiming to be somewhat of an astrologist, has submitted a horoscope of 1919. It is intimated that he predicted some of the events of the past year, including the crash of thrones in Russia, Germany, Austria, Bulgaria and Turkey. This observer, Dr. D. E. Croft, tells us that 1919 is to be a year of extremes. It will witness a continuation of the fall of empires, which will be succeeded by democracies. The Kaiser, he says, will die before the questions arising out of the war are settled—which may or may not be classed as indefinite. He ventures the guess that the work of the Peace Conference at Versailles will lead to a world-republic. Russia will be divided into three parts. The Russian revolution, however, will yield before provisional control by the Allies.

In our own land, business prosperity will be unprecedented. The winter will be an open one, he affirms, with an early spring; but a great drought will extend from New England far west and south in the sp and summer. World reconstruction will be arrange a basis to serve humanity, not to enslave it. Nati Prohibition, he tells us, will not come in July. shall have political troubles with Mexico. There be the usual accompaniment of storms, strike trou and other disturbances; but under the wise and guidance of our President and government, order be preserved and the year will be a fortunate on the whole, in which the foundations of perman peace will be established.

Thus, as in Pandora's box of troubles, hope is fo at the bottom of this catalogue by our American f caster, who knows nothing of oracles, crystals, mirr ghosts or incantations, but simply uses his gift American common sense. There are doubtless m men of unique powers of observation who could m an equally readable and interesting forecast of year. Dr. Croft's predictions are interesting, howe and some of them may turn out to be pretty g guesses.

Let Them Work Hand in Hand

IT IS not surprising that the remarkable prog of the Church Unity movement should b brought about a good deal of discussion relativ the future of denominationalism. In the view of m very eminent Christians, however, this is, after al secondary issue. One friend, who all his life has b affiliated with one of the most conservative of Protestant denominations, writes to us: "Even mitting that there is some truth in the statement the Boston Transcript that 'our religious sects for greater part have been imported and they fit second-hand clothes usually do,' it appears to me t the wisest way to success in Church Unity lies rat in the direction of taking down the fences and prom ing the freest fraternal co-operation between Protestant bodies, which would assuredly foll There is no immediate need of projecting a new is into the discussion, involving the abandonment denominationalism. Unity, not uniformity, is wh is needed now. Time itself will disclose whate further changes the work may demand."

We believe there are many leaders in all the gr denominations who stand ready to go to the limit sacrifice to attain the end desired—a United Chu to fight the undivided forces of evil in the world. T is the purpose that should be kept uppermost. Th is wisdom in making haste slowly and more sure by dealing with the prime question of the unity of t churches as they stand today, on the simple basis loyalty to Jesus Christ.

The Old Order and the New

THE influence exerted by our President in wo councils had its beginnings far back and its neficent results will extend far into the future.

The sweeps of history are of cosmic proportions, a between the causes and the things that grow out them thousands of years must sometimes interve The Kaiser and his henchmen are guilty enough— no man think of denying that—but these Prussi criminals are the product of criminal conditio which reach far back into the past.

Turn and look at that past, not in Germany alo but in all the countries of Europe. What a strang almost unthinkable affair man's past history is, a how cruel and heartless, how brutal and selfish!

Through what long wretched ages were m "butchered to make a Roman holiday"; slaughter by the millions to uphold idiotic dynasties; to ke certain princes in their palaces; to add to the territo of this or that ambitious court.

Think of the cruel burlesque of the middle age with its tawdry knights and ladies, its brutal kings a barons, its tinsel chivalry and tournaments—and i wretched serfs, enslaved, degraded and miserable.

Think of the completeness of the suppression man's thought, of man's individuality, of man's ve selfhood; the program being to exalt the few, a to debase and keep debased the many.

All these things were the sowing—a sowing that h to have a harvest. And the harvest is now.

Humanity is looming up, and its worth and i rights are moving to the center of the stage.

God is abroad—the God that lives and works men's hearts and souls, in the hearts' purest impulse in the souls' noblest aspirations.

Out of a new land a new light has dawned upon shattered world. A new civilization is coming, which Conscience is to speak aloud in affairs of stat Nations are to clasp hands as brothers and Right to sit in the judgment seat.

Passenger Airplane Over London

MR. CLIFFORD B. PRODGER flew over London recently with forty passengers, shattering all records, it is claimed, for carrying passengers through the air, and illustrating the usefulness of the airship as a mode of transportation. Now that the war is over, manufacturers of aircraft are looking forward to the expansion and diversion of that industry to civilian needs. The value of the airplane in the transportation of mail is already an established fact. and in some places it is in successful operation. Though the bird bearing the mail from Chicago, the other day, got weary and had to alight, there is a deep determination among the powerful interests behind the industry to have airships in practical government service at once, in carrying the fast mails to and from the great cities of the country, and also to make and equip airplanes for the carrying of express packages and for the transportation of passengers. There is now an established airplane passenger service across the English Channel. It would not surprise the world very much if some one should fly across the Atlantic. At the world's fair at Chicago there were specimens of the old ox-cart of our pioneers, about the same kind as that used four thousand years ago, and the old stage coach, and the tiny first locomotive and rude car. and the mile-a-minute limited train, but only a hint of the automobile and not even the wildest dream of airplanes. And now, in twenty-six short years, science and practical art have moved so swiftly that the automobile is counted a necessity, and the airship promises to fly faster than the mile-a-minute train or the swifter motor car. Among the ancients the chariot was about the swiftest vehicle for the conveyance of passengers. The chancellor of the exchequer of Ethiopia rode in a chariot drawn by swift horses a thousand miles to the city of Jerusalem for worship. On his return he passed Philip, who was invited into the chariot, and made it a pulpit for a sermon which led to the conversion and baptism of the distinguished traveler. There is this record: "Then the Spirit said unto Philip, Go near, and join thyself to this chariot." (Acts 8 . 29.)

ershing Sees God's Hand

NE reason why Lloyd George has so strong a hold on the English ple is that he has a strong hold on . One reason why General Foch was arvelously successful is that he was aily communion with God and his iour with reference to the leadership e armies. One reason why our army so potential a part in the settlement he war was that our forces, from the sident down to the humblest private he ranks, had unfaltering faith in and in victory through him. This ught was expressed by a service held Chaumont, the American headquarters in Eastern France, when General Pershing, that great general and modest Christian, in an address expressed his gratitude to God for the victory he had brought. He said: "Victory was our goal. It is a hard-won gift of the soldier to his country. Only the soldier knows the cost of a gift we now present to the nation. As soldiers inspired by every spiritual sentiment, we have each silently prayed that the success of righteousness should be ours. Great cause, indeed, have we to thank God for trials successfully met and victories won. Still more should we thank him for the golden future, with its wealth of opportunity and its hope of a permanent universal peace. With thankfulness we humbly acknowledge that his strength has given us the victory. We are thankful that the privilege has been given to us to serve in such a cause." The God of our fathers, of Washington and Lincoln, is the God of our leaders, of Pershing and of our boys today. What gratitude do we owe him! What service we must pay him! General Pershing echoed these words: "And the Lord wrought a great victory." (II Sam. 23 : 12.)

Influenza Kills Six Millions

IT is claimed that 6,000,000 persons have died of influenza and pneumonia in the past twelve weeks. This plague is, therefore, five times more deadly than the war, which is estimated to have killed 20,000,000 persons in four and one-half years. It has already cost London 10,000 lives. In India alone it is estimated that there were 3,000,000 deaths. In Bombay there were 15,000 and in Delhi 800 daily. The Punjab lost 250,000. In Cape Town 2,000 children were left destitute. In Spain, the visitation was terrible, Barcelona having 1,200 deaths daily. All over Europe, Asia, Africa and Australia the totals were dreadful. About 500,000 in this country have died from the plague. The saddest part of the tragedy is that so large a number of our own brave soldiers and sailors had to succumb to it. The Navajo Indians, who had made considerable progress in civilization, have been shockingly slaughtered by influenza, 2,000 deaths having occurred in a total population of 20,000. The influenza, with its 6,000,000 victims, is not to be compared in fatality with some of the other pestilences of history. The "Black Death," it was said, took away in one season half the inhabitants of the earth, including one-half of the people of England. Almost all the great plagues are children of filth. Western science has learned the value of cleanliness. It has also mastered many of these plagues and will eventually conquer them all. These plagues teach the nations the brotherhood of man, with its universal want and woe. That the influenza is not worse in this country is our good fortune. With a few exceptions, no precaution was taken by Federal or state authorities to keep the disease from reaching our ports, or being scattered from them. Crowds have been permitted to jam the railroad cars, the trolleys, the subways, the stores, the halls, the churches, as though there was no death in the air. The health authorities, local and general, are now waking up in good earnest to stop this deadly thing, that these words of the psalmist may be fulfilled: "Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence." (Ps. 91 : 3.)

Killed Wife with Broom

PATRICK QUINN, six feet ten inches tall, killed his wife with a broom. At the police station when told what he had done he collapsed and cried aloud, "I never meant to hurt her." When in his right mind, he loved her and his five children. He did not mean to kill or even hurt her; but drink had made a maniac and a murderer of him, so that he broke her skull with a broomstick. Thank God, our nation has determined that such tragedies shall end. There is no commandment that drink does not break, including this: "Thou shalt not kill." (Ex. 20 : 13.)

Goat-Feathers

IN THE American Magazine for January, Ellis Parker Butler, the humorist, has an article showing the folly of wasting time with trifles, which he calls "Gathering Goat-Feathers." He has this illustration: "Even a cow does better if she sticks close to the business of eating grass and chewing the cud. When she starts in to learn to whistle like a catbird and to flit from field to field like a butterfly; when she strays from the plain milk-producing methods and begins climbing trees and turning somersaults, she may be more picturesque, but she is gathering nothing but 'goat-feathers.'" The wasting of precious time in non-essentials is one of the most common causes of failure in any calling in life. There is a deal of goat-feather gathering in the spiritual world. Half of the failures there can be traced to frittering away the time on trifles or non-essentials. In keeping an eye single to the great and necessary things of the spirit, those of character, service and destiny, the apostle thus sets the example: "For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." (I Cor. 2 : 2.)

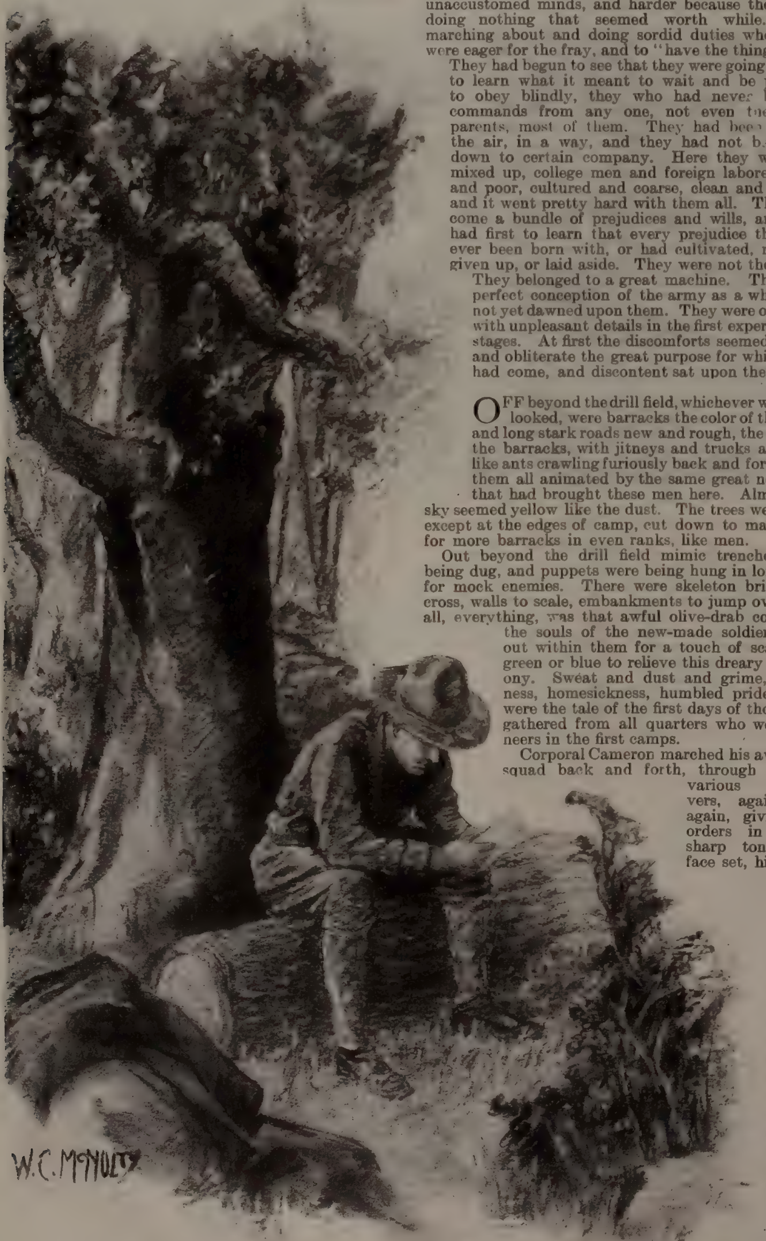
CHAPTER IV

THE sun shone blindingly over the broad dusty drill field. The men marched and wheeled, about-faced and counter-marched in their new olive-drab uniforms, and thought of home; those that had any homes to think about; some who hadn't thought of a home that might have been but for this war.

There were times when their souls could rise to the great occasion and their enthusiasm against the foe could carry them to all lengths of joyful sacrifice, but this was not one of the times. It was a breathless Indian summer morning, and the dust was inches thick. It rose like a mist over the mushroom village of forty thousand men that had arisen at the command of a nation's leader. It lay like a fine yellow powder over everything. An approaching company looked like a cloud as it came near. One could scarcely see the men near by for the cloud of dust everywhere.

The water was bad this morning and every man was thirsty. It had been boiled for safety and was served warm and tasted of disinfectant. The breakfast had been oatmeal and salty bacon. Of course this was nothing like the hardships they would have to endure later, but it was enough for the present to their unaccustomed minds, and harder because they were doing nothing that seemed worth while. Just marching about and doing sordid duties when they were eager for the fray, and to "have the thing over."



He tore the letter open and a faint whiff of violets floated out to him

They had begun to see that they were going to have to learn what it meant to wait and be patient; to obey blindly, they who had never brooked commands from any one, not even their own parents, most of them. They had been free as the air, in a way, and they had not been tied down to certain company. Here they were, all mixed up, college men and foreign laborers, rich and poor, cultured and coarse, clean and defiled, and it went pretty hard with them all. They had come a bundle of prejudices and wills, and they had first to learn that every prejudice they had ever been born with, or had cultivated, must be given up, or laid aside. They were not their own. They belonged to a great machine. The great perfect conception of the army as a whole had not yet dawned upon them. They were occupied with unpleasant details in the first experimental stages. At first the discomforts seemed to rise and obliterate the great purpose for which they had come, and discontent sat upon their faces.

OFF beyond the drill field, whichever way they looked, were barracks the color of the dust, and long stark roads new and rough, the color of the barracks, with jitneys and trucks and men like ants crawling furiously back and forth upon them all animated by the same great necessity that had brought these men here. Almost the sky seemed yellow like the dust. The trees were gone except at the edges of camp, cut down to make way for more barracks in even ranks, like men.

Out beyond the drill field mimic trenches were being dug, and puppets were being hung in long lines for mock enemies. There were skeleton bridges to cross, walls to scale, embankments to jump over, and all, everything, was that awful olive-drab color, till the souls of the new-made soldiers cried out within them for a touch of scarlet or green or blue to relieve this dreary monotony. Sweat and dust and grime, weariness, homesickness, humbled pride, these were the tale of the first days of those men gathered from all quarters who were pioneers in the first camps.

Corporal Cameron marched his awkward squad back and forth, through all the various maneuvers, again and again, giving his orders in short, sharp tones, his face set, his heart tortured with the thought of the long mont years of this that might be before him. The

How to Interpret Prophecy

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

THE Greek word for prophet (prophetēs) means simply one who speaks forth a message, without reference necessarily to prediction. Nevertheless, prediction is an im- tant element in prophecy, and it is this element, how to unfold its meaning and application, of ch this article treats.

I

1) In the interpretation of prophecy, the right ting-point is a firm and clear conviction that the le is, throughout, a revelation from God. The lutionary hypothesis of modern criticism, in other ds, can accomplish little of true value in the inter- tation of prophecy.

2) To interpret prophecy, one should be familiar h the whole Bible, which means that he should d the whole Bible. It is admitted that he may n some knowledge and information by reading ks about prophecy, and perhaps by studying rts, if his taste or aptitude lies in that direction. t this will be like becoming acquainted with New rk or Chicago through a guide book or an strated magazine, as compared with visiting those es or taking up a residence in them.

3) He should read the whole Bible in an intel- nt and reasonable way, with sufficient respect its divine Author, for example, as to believe that re is a unity in it—a beginning, a continuation l an end—and that one part of it fits into another t, and that into another, making a complete ole.

(4) To read it in an intelligent and reasonable y means to begin at Genesis and follow the wake the Holy Spirit to Revelation. In Barnard's rogress of Doctrine in the New Testament," he itends not only for the inspiration of the separate oks of the New Testament, but that of their order d arrangement in the volume; and I am prepared believe that the same claim might be made for Old Testament also. At all events, the theory at the books of the Pentateuch, or any essential rts of them, were written at a period later than that ditionally ascribed to them, is seriously shattered en one reads the Bible in this way.

(5) It is not enough to give a single reading to nesis and the same to Exodus, and thus throughout other books. One should read Genesis suf- iently often to become easily familiar with its at outstanding facts before taking up Exodus in same way. This has come to be called the syn- etic reading or study of the Bible, and it is essential order to perceive the relationship of one book to other, and thus become possessed of what is a ndamental principle of all biblical interpretation.

(6) He should pursue this method undeviatingly til he concludes the second book of Kings, at st, at which point it is that the kingdoms both of rael and Judah are carried into captivity.

All prophecy centers in, or gathers round, the story of those kingdoms and the Gentile nations in tal contact with them. The reason of this is that God's plan to redeem the human race on this rth he has shown those kingdoms, i. e., the seed Abraham, as a secondary instrument for the pur- se.

Their captivity, especially the Babylonian cap- vity of Judah, is central to pretty nearly the whole heme of prophecy. There were prophets before e captivity, and during and following that event, d it is important in their interpretation to dis- nguish among them.

(7) Just now, however, our interest is confined those books of the prophets from Isaiah to Malachi hich cover the period from about the eighth to the urth century B. C. Of course, there were prophets, d prophets of prediction, earlier than they, Moses d David, for example; but for our present purpose e are limiting ourselves to them, because their prophecies were written down as compared with the spoken utterances only of most of their predecessors.

II

AT THIS point it is important to note that written prophecy marks an epoch in the history of the two kingdoms named, and hence in the history of the whole world. Written prophecy began at about the eighth century B. C., or some time after the division of the nation, on account of its sin, into the two kingdoms. Prior to this time the prophets for the most part had spoken their messages but had not written them.

This change of procedure on their part, therefore, was ominous for the nation, and for the reason that until that time there was no need, as a rule, for written prophecies. And why? Because God always was present with his people in the theocratic sense, and being present with them, he communicated his will to them as it was required by means of the Shekinah (Exod. 25 : 22), or by the spoken words of his prophets; witness Elijah and Elisha. These spoken words were meant for the time then present, the generation in which the prophets lived, and it was not necessary that they should be written down.

But now, however, when the necessity for written prophecy arose, it foreshadowed a time when God would withdraw his presence from his people, and when spoken prophecy as such would cease. This, in turn, meant a postponement of the promised Messianic kingdom (Amos 8 : 11, 12; Lam. 2 : 9). A postponement, but not an abrogation of that kingdom. It did not mean that God had changed his mind about it (Rom. 11: 29). The kingdom was postponed but not abrogated.

It was this fact that called for the writing down, the recording of the prophecies. The people, because of their iniquity, were to be rooted up out of their land and dispersed among the Gentiles. In the theocratic sense, God would depart from them, and they would need comfort and instruction and guidance in the future generations. Especially would they need data to establish the truth of the divine predictions concerning them, and to encourage them to repent and return to God in faith when the time came.

In illustration of this, witness Zechariah's words after the return from Babylon:

"Be not as your fathers, unto whom the former prophets cried, saying, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, Turn ye now from your evil doings, but they did not hear, nor hearken unto me, saith the Lord.

"Your fathers, where are they? And the prophets, do they live forever?

"But my words and my statutes, which I commanded my servants the prophets, did they not overtake your fathers? And they turned, and said, Like as the Lord of hosts thought to do unto us, according to our ways, and according to our doings, so hath he dealt with us." (1 : 4-6).

So will it be said also when other prophecies are fulfilled in the time to come.

Written prophecy, therefore, while it had a mission for the immediate present—the time in which the prophets lived—had another mission for the future, even the remote future. It spoke of the temporal and spiritual blessings which God would bestow upon Israel and Judah, if obedient and faithful; but it spoke also of the judgments that would fall upon them if they failed to be obedient and faithful. And then, never omitting it, it spoke of the restored or renewed blessing that would be theirs when, at a later time, they should through penitence and faith become obedient and faithful.

There is great variety in detail in the way the prophets write, for there is great variety in the men themselves, in their historical environment, and in the particular objective held before them by the divine Spirit; but in the main they agree in saying these three things:

(1) A day of judgment is coming on Israel and Judah, which will end in repentance and prepare the way for the Messianic kingdom. These judgments will fall also on the Gentile nations.

(2) Israel and Judah will be regathered to their own land and a remnant, purified by judgments, will form the nucleus of the restored nation. In the midst of this nation God will again dwell in temporal and spiritual blessing.

(3) This restored kingdom will be the germ of the Messianic kingdom that shall fill the whole earth.

These thoughts are lucidly and beautifully worked out in "God's Revelations of Himself to Men," by Dr. Samuel J. Andrews (Scribners). I wish I could add that it is purchasable at any religious bookstore, but I regret to say it is out of print. Libraries have it, however, and it will well reward any Bible student for the time and inconvenience it may cost him to look it up, and to become acquainted with its contents.

III

WE RETURN now to what was said about the synthetic reading of the Bible up to, and including, II Kings. Of course it was not meant that the reading should end there. But there it is that we form a junction, so to speak, with the written prophecies. This we gather from the prophecies themselves.

And here it might be well for us to change the order of our reading just a little. Instead of taking up the books of the prophets, as they follow one another in our Bible, it might be better to do so chronologically as far as possible.

This chronology can commonly be ascertained from the books themselves. Frequently the prophets state the reign, and even the very year, in which their prophecies were uttered; and where these data are not recorded, the contents of the prophecies compared with the record in II Kings or the other historical books will almost certainly reveal them.

It is in this way we gather, for example, that Amos was the earliest, or one of the earliest, of these prophets.

Let us, then, read Amos as we read the other books down to II Kings. Let us read it at a single sitting, giving no particular attention to its later divisions into chapter and verse. Let us read it again and again in the same way. Let us call upon the aid of the Holy Spirit as we read it.

As the late J. D. Herr said: "The Bible is the infallible Word of God; hence, to be rightly understood, it requires an infallible interpreter, and in the wondrous economy of grace such an interpreter has been provided. All true conceptions of future events came only to holy men who were in full sympathy with God, and to them only as they were enlightened and prompted by the Holy Spirit. If, then, all true prophecy be the direct product of the Holy Spirit, so is it also the province of the Holy Spirit alone to interpret it.

"The Bible does not cater to the peculiar and favorite theories of men. No matter how intelligent and scholarly the student of prophecy may be, he will be wholly unfit to apprehend the mind of God in relation to the future, unless he assumes the proper attitude of a devout inquirer after truth."

This is not a desirable point at which to break off in this article, but to prolong it might transgress too seriously upon the valuable space of this journal. In our next, however, we shall enter at once on an analysis of Amos, and perhaps a later prophet, pointing out two great laws or principles of prophetic interpretation. An acquaintance with these laws or principles will set us far along in an understanding of the inspired contents of the prophets.

A "Forward Movement" Needed for The Church

NOW that the war is over, the Church should seek fitly to humble herself t the throne of grace, and implore ivine aid in going forth with the mes- age of her Lord to the nations. The hurch should no longer confine her ork to China, India, Burma, Africa; he greatest need for pure evangelical reaching is at home, in Europe and mong the most highly cultivated na- ions. The Lord God Almighty has hown his Church the dreadful and nournful need of the Gospel of Jesus Christ to be given to those nations, and she now has the opportunity to evangelize and bring to the Cross those Erebus countries. There must be a Forward Movement, and a "Go" in the Church, not only to heathen lands but everywhere. I would rather chance the heathen in his ignorance than those highly educated countries where, with their intellectual geniuses, they can send thousands of souls into eternity in less time than it can be told. Could the Church in every country stand as a unit, and in the name of him "who walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks, holding the seven stars in his right hand," all the powers of darkness could not stay the progress of the King of kings and Lord of lords. The results of the world-war should open the eyes of all Christian people—those that are spiritually-minded especially—to the fact that if the Gentile Churches fail to establish truth and righteousness, our God will close their times, and call his long-neglected elect nation, the Jews, to teach all men the true God and eternal life through his Son Jesus Christ. The writer is within sight of his seventy-fourth mile-post, and he desires to express his deepest convictions that the taking and possessing of the old Jerusalem and the opening up of the seas is the grandest victory of the war, and will produce the blessed results of the return of the Jews and the unifying of God's people, along with the nation that shall be born in a day. The Royalty of Christian Service

*A SERMON BY REV. DAVID JAMES BURRELL, D.D., LL.D.

TEXT—Matt. 20 : 27. "Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant."

AND who would not be chief? A man without ambition is a mere manikin. "Better not be at all than not be noble." There is much of sound wisdom in the remark of Cæsar that he "would rather be first in a small village than second in Rome." Life is a ladder, and climbers are the only people who reach the top.

But how can it be done? How can one forge to the front? "By riding roughshod over all competitors," says the world. "By serving all," says Christ. Which is right? Let current events teach us. Chauvinism has recently been riding to a fall.

The way of service is the only way to chieftainship because it is the divine way. God himself is supreme by virtue of the fact that he is Servant of all. His goodness is a universal dispensation; like the light of the sun which shines for all.

God unveils himself in Christ, who is the very incarnation of service. His life is briefly comprehended in the monograph, "He went about doing good."

He was the most ambitious man that ever lived in this world of ours. His purpose, as he announced it, was to establish a Kingdom in which his own glory was destined to cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

HOW did he propose to do this? By being Servant of all. He said "The Son of Man is come not to be ministered unto but to minister." Only once did he assume the outward form of royalty, namely, when he suffered the multitude to escort him to Jerusalem with waving palms and cries of "Hosanna to the Son of David!"

But that incident must be interpreted in the light of another which occurred four days later. His disciples had been disputing as to which should be greatest in his kingdom, when he, knowing what was in their hearts, took a towel and girded himself, and, pouring water into a basin, washed his disciples' feet, saying, "I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done unto you."

And the next day he was crucified. Never in all the centuries has there been such an illustration of the supremacy of service as when the King of kings suffered himself to be hung up betwixt heaven and earth that he might "taste death for every man," even for those who slew him. And for what reward? "A name!" A name "which is far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named not only in this world but in that which is to come."

In heaven a great multitude that no man can number ascribes glory and honor and dominion and power to that name; and on earth an ever increasing host of believers sing,

"O that with yonder sacred throng
I at his feet may fall;
I'll join the everlasting song
And crown him Lord of all!"

WHAT is Christ doing in heaven now? Still serving; and reigning because he serves. In the parable of the Marriage Feast he said, "Blessed are those servants whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching. Verily I say unto you, that he shall gird himself and make them to sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them" (Luke 12 : 37). Reigning, interceding, serving! This is Christ's way."

And this is the very opposite of the world's way. You have seen, perhaps, a remarkable picture called "The Conquerors," in which Cæsar, Alexander, Napoleon, Attila the Scourge, Boadicea and Timour the Tartar are represented as advancing on battle steeds and in war chariots, with blaring trumpets and waving banners, leading a militant host. On either side, as far as the eye can reach, are naked bodies of the slain in attitudes of anguish, headless and dismembered. Such has been the progress of the mighty toward the conquest of the world.

Look on that picture and then on this: a Man in homespun, with a humble retinue of handicraftsmen, is making an itinerary through Galilee. The people of a certain village, having heard of his approach, are bringing out their sick and laying them on couches along the way. The lame and halt and withered are there, mothers with ailing children in their arms, blind men hoping to receive their sight, and lepers in the distance with their fingers on their lips. He enters—this Man in homespun—the Servant of all. He passes through the village street saying "Be whole!" "Receive thy sight!" "Arise and walk!" The King of kings in the guise of a servant has passed through the village on his way to universal conquest; and behold, the people are rejoicing and making merry behind him. Thus does he stoop to conquer. It is the divine way.

NOW listen to this: "Let the mind be also in you which was in Christ Jesus: who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to grasp his equality with God: but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men. And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow."

So much for Christ; now let us turn to the Christian, who is so called because he professes to be like him.

The Christian should be of all men most ambitious: ambitious to be like Christ, to make the most of himself, to occupy the largest possible field of influence in the behalf of his fellow men and for the glory of God. And the way to this sort of chieftainship is pointed out in the words "Let him be servant of all." What was it Jesus said at the foot-washing? "I have left you an example." On another occasion he said, "I am among you as one that serveth: and I have appointed unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me" (Luke 22 : 27, 29). The symbol of our servitude is the yoke, which is always for two. When we serve, the Lord serves with us and through us and beside us.

Do you ask what our reward shall be? Service is its own reward. There is no pleasure like that which Cowper calls "the generous pleasure of a kindly deed." It is, as Shakespeare says, "twice blessed; it blesseth him that gives and him that takes." A clerk searching among the accounts of Edward II found this singular entry, "Half a crown to the jester for making the king laugh." When we remember melancholy Edward, we are moved to concede that the jester earned his pay. But the half-crown was the smallest part of it; for doubtless when Edward laughed the jester laughed with him. Joy is infectious. The heart always burns in loving service.

IN ONE of Horace Mann's lectures he says, "The soul of the truly benevolent man (he might have said the truly great) does not seem to reside much in its own body. Its life, to a great extent, is a mere reflex of the lives of others. It migrates into their bodies and, identifying its existence with theirs, finds its own happiness in increasing and prolonging their pleasures, in extinguishing or solacing their pains."

And the influence of service outlives the servant. Shakespeare never said a falser thing than this: "The evil a man does lives after him; the good is oft interred with his bones." The evil we do may be forgotten, but our loving-kindnesses are immortal. O may forget that Da Vinci painted "The Last Supper but the dim figures of the men who sat around t table will always be remembered, because they ceaselessly going about doing good.

But the great reward is the "penny at evening bearing the image and superscription of the King a "Well done, good servant." This is the token th opens the gates of heaven to all believers; the bless heaven whereof it is written, "There his servants serve him." For what is heaven but promotion larger tasks? "Are they not all ministering spiri sent forth to minister?" Hell is simply self-servi heaven is the service of everybody but self.

We conclude, then, that to reign is to serve.

IN COLOGNE Cathedral there is a rude wood image of a giant with a child on his shoulder. "W is this?" I asked the sacristan; and he answere "This is Offero, the man in search of a master." Th he told the story: Offero would serve only the migh iest. He offered himself to the king; and served hi well, until on a certain occasion in the banquet h the name of Satan was mentioned, whereat the ki turned pale. "Why art thou frightened, O king?" asked. "Because this is the prince of darkness, a he is mightier than I."

The giant went in search of the prince of darkne and found him without difficulty. He entered h service and all went well until as they were journe ing they came to the cross-roads where stood a cru fix. There Satan fell a-trembling and refused to pa on. "Why art thou afraid?" asked Offero. "B cause this is Christ, who is mightier than I." The Offero went searching for Christ. A barefoot fri told him to wait at the ford of the river until Chris should pass. He built him a hut, accordingly, an helped travelers on their way. One dark night h heard a voice without, calling, "Offero, come an carry me over!"

He found a child awaiting him, lifted it upon h shoulders and, staff in hand, entered the ford. Th winds blew fiercely and the waters rose above him the burden on his shoulders grew heavier and heavie until it seemed to crush him; at length he reache the other shore, set down his burden, and lo! Chris stood before him, saying, "Inasmuch as thou has done it unto one of these least, thou hast done it unt me."

"And in the moonlight blue
The giant saw—not the wandering boy,
But him who walked upon the sea
And o'er the plains of Galilee;
Till, filled with mystic, awful joy,
His dear Lord Christ he knew.

"Oh, little is all loss,
And brief the space 'twixt shore and shore,
If thou, Lord Jesus, on us lay,
Through the deep waters on our way,
The burden that Christopheros bore—
To carry thee across!"

No man is his own man. We are interdependen units in the world's social life. The only question i whether we will serve meanly or splendidly. Th basest serve themselves; they serve the lust of th flesh, the lust of the eye and the pride of life. Chris stands for the noblest and best. "Names name hin not"; but of all his names none is sweeter to a Christian than that by which the broken-hearted Magdalene called him when she found him standing besid the empty sepulchre: Rabboni; that is to say, "M Master!"

Blessed are they who stoop to conquer, as Christ did; who wear the yoke on their way to the crown For those who serve and suffer with him shall als reign with him.

"O Jesus, thou art standing
Outside the fast-closed door,
In lowly patience waiting
To pass the threshold o'er."

The Stranger at the Door

IN THE solitude of an evening at home, sing those beautiful words to yourself, and then study Turner's picture of our Saviour knocking at the fast-closed door. It is the pride of many generous souls to boast of their wholesome hospitality, and many homes have the panel inscribed "Christ is the Head of this house." That being true, is he always the honored Sovereign? When a guest of state calls, our finest etiquette is displayed, and we are not guilty of any breach of propriety. Is that true when we realize that our silent Guest is always present? Gaze on the soft, pleading eyes. Listen to the mellow, entreating voice:

"I died for you, my children,
And will ye treat me so?"

Think of that call of the Strong to the weak; the Hope for the hopeless; the Comforter for the weary and distressed; then dare you be "out" when such a Friend calls? When a child turns disdainfully from a parent, the parent grieves in helplessness and silence. Heed that supreme, all-forgiving Parent, and stop your mad dash after nothingness; halt your headlong plunge into emptiness. Permit your door to open as the door of the hospitable Southerner is, always ajar. The call has come! Love tears down walls of infamy; heals wounded lives; makes men of cowards, and resolves the improbable into the positive. It is the dynamo of the world. No human heart can beat without it. Therefore, do not be deaf to that gentle, loving knocking, but sing in glad renunciation of self:

"O Lord, with shame and sorrow
We open now the door;
Dear Saviour, enter, enter,
And leave us nevermore!"

The Transformed Desert

SUNDAY, January 19. Isa. 35 : 1. "The desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." I have lately read two fascinating articles which had most suggestive titles. One of them was entitled "Notes from an Ambulance Train," and it contained the detailed observations of a fervent botanist, and the observations were made through the window of the train as it journeyed up the line for a load. "Traveler's Joy runs riot over the bushes and sloping banks; coming just after the roses have gone, it is especially welcome." "The Scottish bluebell is a welcome sight in the hedgerows." And this is from an ambulance train running through the desolate parts of France! The second article bore the title "The Wild Flowers of the Trenches," and the enthusiastic observer tells how he has seen along the line of the trenches, and around the shell holes, such flowering plants as marguerites and hedge parsley and poppies. When I read these eager records of these waste places I could not but remember the words of the astonished prophet, "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom like the rose."

The wild flowers of the trenches! Beautiful things springing up in the home of struggle! The scenes of warfare now become the scenes of novel loveliness! The fields of carnage the site of new worlds! And who can tell what strong and healthy moral growths are to spring out of all the tragic desolations of our time? God's seed has been sown in the blood of our sacrifices, and on the stern wilderness golden harvests will be reaped by generations yet unborn. There be some who say, "To what purpose is this waste?" The waving corn of coming days shall be the answer and the memorial of our sacrifice. J. H. J.

Willing to Be Persuaded

MONDAY, January 20. II Tim. 1 : 12. "I . . . am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day." In this word "persuaded" we find a double meaning. It bears the interpretation that Paul had allowed himself to be persuaded—that he was willing to be convinced. This reminds us of Professor William James's significant phrase, "the will to believe." Before a juror is accepted in a case at law, he is asked whether he has an open mind, whether he is willing to be persuaded. If he be not willing to listen to the evidence without prejudice, he is summarily rejected. The fatal fault of many of us in religion is that we are not willing to be persuaded—we are not persuadable. We lack "the will to believe." Then in this word there is the further suggestion of a conclusion which does not end in itself, but which leads to action. That is to say, persuasion does not end the matter; it is simply a means to an end, the end being action. A young man said, after having heard numerous missionary appeals, "I am getting tired of this sort of thing; it is getting on my nerves." A friend of his, who knew the need of his life for action, retorted, "Motor nerves, I hope?" Paul's persuasion led straight to the motor centers of his life. He said, practically, "If this thing be true, then I must do something." We may read of a fire and not move out of our cosy chairs, but if the fire be near enough for us to see the peril, near enough for us to hear the cries of children in distress, surely we shall not long remain inactive. Faith in God should move us to ceaseless endeavor. It must so move us or we shall lose that faith. Some things must be used in order to be kept. Water in motion purifies itself. Stagnant, it breeds death. I knew a child who kept his generous piece of cake, hid it away from his comrades, and found, when he proposed to feast upon it, that it was unfit to eat. A creed which does not impel us to action is worse than useless, and wickeder than hoarded food. It is hoarded truth, hoarded love, hoarded life. C. C. A.

The Eternal Son of the Eternal Father

TUESDAY, January 21. Luke 10 : 22. "All things are delivered to me of my Father: and no man knoweth who the Son is, but the Father; and who the Father is, but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him." Jesus Christ, who spoke these words, was either the greatest impostor in the history of the human race, or he was what he claimed to be, the eternal Son of the eternal Father. His teaching is either the most fatal deception worked upon men because it concerns their everlasting destiny, or it is the most blessed message that was ever delivered on earth. There is no middle ground before a text like this. He declares here that he possesses knowledge of God such as only God himself can have. He speaks from the most complete intimacy with God, from out of the ineffable circle of the Holy Trinity. He speaks of God as God himself would speak. That is the first noteworthy fact in this profound declaration. It represents the climax of his dignity as the prophet of Jehovah. No one who came with a commission from God to men could ever speak with the authority and the fulness of utterance which is found in Jesus. He has come out of the bosom of the Father to declare the Father to the Father's children. He is the Grand Messenger of God's evangel. He has spoken the last word regarding all that concerns God's relation to us and ours to him. Even then he has not poured forth the full measure of all that may be known of God: our finite intellects could not compass all that. We shall know all when we see him, for we shall be like him. But what he has told us is first-hand information, brought to us straight from the heart of God by the Son of his love.

The second point worthy of note in this text is, that Jesus declares himself the sole agent and plenipotentiary for the transaction of any business that the Father may have with his children, or the children with the Father. God has approached men in this Jesus, who said to Philip: "He that hath seem me hath seen the Father." And by him alone man obtains access to the Father; for he hath said: "No one cometh to the Father but by me." W. H. T. D.

The Pouring of His Spirit

WEDNESDAY, January 22. Acts 2 : 17. "And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God. I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh." We have had the patriarchal, the Mosaic, the Messianic dispensations for the salvation of the race, and now we are in the final administration of the diffusion of the Holy Spirit of God. He is everywhere present at the same moment; he takes the words of the prophets and of the Christ and applies all power, love and purity unto believing hearts. He is God in spiritual life and transforming light. He makes application of the truth to the mind, of the blood of cleansing to the heart, of the love of God to the affections.

With the Spirit's baptism of power, we speak as witnesses for Christ and shine as lights in the world. We see visions of coming triumphs, grander than any in the past. By the Holy Ghost, God the Father and Christ the Son are with their people always, even unto the end of the world. In every assembly of the church, there the Holy Trinity is in the midst, pouring out the divine influence upon prayerful, trustful hearts. Oh for a new Pentecost that will endue all Christendom with the power of the apostolic church! Oh for a missionary revival that will begin where the war leaves off and enter upon the winning of the whole world for Christ, an evangelistic movement that will make Billy Sunday's one hundred thousand converts in New York City seem as drops before the mighty shower! Then our God will open the windows of heaven and pour out such floods of blessing as shall cover the earth as waters cover the sea.

Mountain-Dwellers

THURSDAY, January 23. Isa. 40 : 9. "O Zion, . . . get thee up into the high mountain." There are as many degrees of altitude in the spiritual world as there are in the physical. There are cave-dwellers, and nomads of the desert, and city folk, and mountaineers. We may all be, whatever our dwelling-place, God's mountaineers. These are his fighting men. They fight their battles at high altitudes, as under the very eye of God. They live on the heights.

Many of the most significant events in history have occurred on mountains. Jesus was a mountain-dweller. He was tempted on a mountain; he began his public ministry on a mountain; he was transfigured on a mountain; on a skull-shaped mountain he paid "life's arrears of pain, darkness and cold"; from the slope of a mountain he ascended in the attitude of blessing. But aside from these facts, Jesus' whole life was one of lofty aims and high purposes. Above the plane of animalism, indeed above the plane of mere intellection, in the realm of truths which never could have been discovered by investigation or research; in the realm of forces which are not of the earth earthy; in communion with the Eternal, he spent his lonely, lovely years. Above the world of pleasure-seeking and money-getting; above the world of mere passive enjoyment; above the world of fame and social conquest, he lived, serenely and by choice.

There is a term we use which explains this detachment, this isolation, this insulation from the atmosphere of the temporal, this elevation above the transient. We call it unworldliness. There is deep truth in the mystic saying, "We must learn to leave the world to get strength to live in the world." Some of the sanest, shrewdest and most practical characters the world has ever known have been men and women of very unworldly spirit. General "Chinese" Gordon was such a man. Elizabeth Fry was such a woman. So was Joesphine Lowell. Intensely interested in human conditions, such spirits have borne about with them an atmosphere of detachment from the petty schemes of petty souls. The tragedy of life is that, conscious as we are of our capacity for moral elevation, we so often turn aside, prefer to live in the lowlands, and thus forfeit our souls' inheritance. Day and night the voice of the Master calls us, "Get thee up into a high mountain." C. C. A.

Seeing Christ

FRIDAY, January 24. Luke 10 : 23, 24. "Blessed are the eyes that see the things that ye see: for I tell you that many prophets and kings have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them." This saying of Jesus has been declared "one of the sublimest utterances of our Lord which appear in the first three Gospels." It is that indeed. But wherein did the blessedness of the little band which he had gathered about him consist? In what were they privileged more than the ancient prophets and people of God's elect nation? If we will summon before our mind the Messianic hope of the Israelites as it had been expressed in the most beautiful imagery and with ardent longing by Jacob and Moses at their departure, by David their sweet singer, by the eloquent Isaiah, by Jeremiah even as he sat mourning among the ruins of the holy city, we shall easily understand the Lord. He is speaking of himself: in him the Desire of all the Nations had arrived. The vision of the seers of old was embodied in him; he was the subject of those glowing orations which had been spoken in the streets of Jerusalem and of those ringing hymns which had been chanted in its temple courts on many an august occasion. The Star of Jacob had arisen and the Everlasting Light was shining in the land of Zebulon and Nephthali, and the people that sat in darkness and in the shadow of death were blessing the days of the incarnate Son of God as the days of their gracious visitation. The Teacher had come to them who spoke as never man spoke; the Deliverer had arrived who was lifting from their consciences the yoke of sin that was more galling than the yoke of the old ceremonial ordinances; the Benefactor had stepped into their humble abodes and heavenly gratuities were dropping upon their sick and suffering wherever he came. Yes, it was a great and glorious time to live in and to die in.

What the contemporaries of Jesus saw and heard was but the beginning. We have seen greater things since—we who hear his Gospel and believe it.

First the Father

SATURDAY, January 25. Eph. 3 : 15. "Of whom the whole family in earth and heaven is named." God was Father before he was Creator. He loved before he gave. Love is his being, flowing forth as a river of life through the universe. The divine attributes are branches of this river, called the holiness of love, the omnipotence of love, the merciful goodness of love. This parental love of the Father is manifested toward his whole family in heaven and earth, as it is toward his only begotten Son. This was stated in Jesus' last prayer, "that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them and I in them." "Love and I," two infinite Lovers of their human children. The Father could not love his irresponsive worlds; only admiration for these filled his mind. He called his creations "very good," because they were for his needy loved ones.

The products of God's power, wisdom and skill from the hand of the Architect and Builder of worlds were all for the convenience and happiness of the objects of his affection. He waited long ages for the completion of these edifices as homes for his household. Who could doubt the Father's forgiveness toward his wayward ones when he has built so many mansions for us and sent his only Son to win us back to his arms? What rapture of love when we sob our repentance upon his bosom! He seeks after us more than we seek after him. Blessed God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, how we should love thee in return for all thy wealth of love and riches of worlds given unto us! Then we must remember that thou wilt make us shine as the sun when we reach home, wilt robe us in the vestments of light, making us one with thine angelic family. Do we feel the drawing power of the lodestone of divine love, and do we yield to its sweet, sacred burnings in our hearts?

Copyright, 1919, by Charles M. Sheldon

CHAPTER ELEVEN

CHAPLAIN WILLIS HUNTER had just come in from one of his great crusades for federation of the churches and was taking dinner with Dr. and Mrs. Ward on his way to another campaign, 'covering a dozen states and over fifty cities and towns. After dinner he went into the study.

"I've had the time of my life, it goes without saying. Town after town has come in to the federated plan. Denominationalism as such has lost its hold. The imagination of the present-day Christian is fired by the thought of the one leadership. See what we gained by federating our forces at the village of Colfax. Union of a Baptist and Presbyterian church.

"'1. Federation saves paying two pastors and keeping two church buildings, when one is sufficient. It makes the public more willing to aid.

"'2. The congregation being more than doubled, there is more enthusiasm and will to work.

"'3. It has silenced the criticism that the churches are competing instead of cooperating.

"'4. The economic and fraternal features of federation appeal to the public and bring into line people who did not patronize either church before.

"'The new plan has met a real need in the community and the people respond accordingly.

"'We combine the leadership to the advantage of both the church and the community.

"'Since the federation of the two churches the Union Church has been the dynamic center of the village and has been the leader in all movements for community betterment. This is a well known fact in the community.' *

"And look here, Brother Ward!" Hunter went on with boundless enthusiasm. "On this last campaign the Committee on the United Church of the United States sent me to my own town of Bayview, with its seven different denominations. You remember the situation there right after the war was so impossible that I did not feel able to go on with my work there.

"Well, you never saw such a miracle of grace as the one at Bayview. Seven churches, Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, Presbyterian, United Presbyterian, Christian and Lutheran have formed a united body, and the results are even more splendid than we dared to dream.

"As I said before, there is no difficulty over denominational questions. Two Baptists are as apt to fall out with one another as are a Baptist and an Episcopalian.

"I have learned this also: that no church has a monopoly of good Christians; there are as many good workers from one as from another. Among our Sunday school teachers are Baptists, Episcopalians, Methodists, Lutherans, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists, and from their work no one could tell which was which. Denominational lines seem to be almost entirely forgotten, though there are several who retain connection with their denominational church and help in its support. I think it would be impossible for one to belong to this church for any length of time and retain any denominational prejudice. It is very seldom that any one refuses to join on the ground that the church is a union church, though we have a few, an increasingly small number, who work in the church but do not join it.*

"If any one had told me six months ago that such a union could actually be made, I would have refused to believe it. Today I see it with my own eyes.

"More than that, Dr. Ward," Hunter went on, pacing along the strip of worn rug and wearing its path deeper with his energetic stride, "the drive for money is coming on far beyond all expectations. Under the Federal Council and the United Missionary Committee of all the Denominations we have, as you know, set the amount for the first drive at $100,000,000, and it is going over the top with a bound. Look here!"

HUNTER excitedly pulled out a bunch of official documents and opened them on Ward's desk. The tabulated lists of amounts already pledged were over $80,000,000, and the canvass of the states had only just begun.

"We can redeem the world, now we are a united Christendom! There is money enough in the hands of church members alone to do it. All the big business men demand is a showing of the need and the results. That last letter you had published from Underwood in North China brought a contribution of $100,000 from one man. Dick's letters from Palestine printed in the New York press have netted thousands of dollars. If we can only make the moneyed men of America see in this war for Christ as big an issue as the war for human freedom, we shall get all the money we can spend. That is what we must make them see. We must make good all along the line. Our only embarrassment right now is the crowd of volunteers. The American College, as you know, is so full it can't hold another volunteer. We've got to build colleges in half a dozen centers. And, did I tell you, Long and Browning of Washington have promised the money for plans, and the firm of Andrews in Chicago will subscribe half a million to start the first buildings. Oh, it's a great time to live! But I've talked myself out. Give me some letters from the boys out on the field. That's what I want to take with me in this campaign. I don't have to do a thing to get money but tell the audience what the boys and their wives are doing over there all over the world."

"I have one here from Bert that just came in this morning," said Dr. Ward. "He and Esther are having a very remarkable experience in the province of Sonora. Let me read the most important part. It reads like the wildest romance. And yet I know that there is nothing, not even in war, to equal some of the experiences of the missionaries. He says: 'Two weeks ago I went up to Baroyeca again in search of Alamero's family. And I found his wife and children working in a copper mine at Talatecas! I got them out and brought them down to Alamos, and Cadena, that's her name, is working in our house. She makes a wonderful nurse for Albert Richard Chandler, who, I need not tell you, is the best baby ever born in Mexico.

"'Our congregations continue to overflow our building. The committee is sending us more teachers. We have quite a colony here now, over seven of us, and the whole district is becoming civilized. There is a lot of adventure here. It beats Château-Thierry a mile. I have to superintend the farm, the hospital just finished, the coffee house, the school and the printing plant for the young men. It's a man's job, and it looks like it would last as long as I do, for the ignorance and degradation are past belief; but then so is the power of the Gospel to transform.

"'I enclose picture of Cadena and Albert Richard. We are a happy family. Bert.'

"And here is one from Underwood's wife. It is part of the tragedy of service in all the world.

"'Robert passed away last Tuesday. The scourge of typhus following the great floods and his enormous labors for the district caught him and two of our best teachers. His body lies in the mission compound burial place, and his pupils bring flowers to it daily. He fell in battle facing forward.'

"And here is a bunch of letters from Turkey and the East. 'Mohammedanism is beginning to yield to Christianity under the Allied rule in Turkey. The great college on the Bosphorus swarms with Mussulman-born students. In the Balkans, Bulgaria is gradually regaining her faith in God which she lost in her mad scramble to out-German Germany. The mission stations in Rumania, Serbia, Albania, Russia, all report marvelous triumphs of the Gospel. A new day is dawning for all the world, thanks to a united Protestantism and the response of our youth to the greatest Adventure of the ages.'"

THREE months later, when Hunter had finished his tour and while he was again in the familiar little study, now famous for its great counsels, Dr. Ward was called to his telephone by long distance.

It was Requa. She was saying:

"Dr. Ward, father has had another stroke. The doctor says it is probably the last. Can you come? He asks for you. And will you bring a flag? He asks for that."

Ward turned to Hunter, giving him the message. Hunter was greatly moved. Dr. Ward took up the instrument again.

"Chaplain Hunter is here in the study. Can you listen to him just a word?"

Requa gave eager assent.

Hunter expressed his deep sympathy and asked if he might come with Dr. Ward. Requa gave a tearful and grateful affirmative, and so at the last moment there in the prison hospital two of her best friends stood with her by the side of the dying Rufus Randall.

He had made known to Requa, who understood his slightest motion, that he wanted the flag of his country put on his breast, and as he was not able to move his hands she placed them over the folds of the banner. With a look on his features that none of them will ever forget, the dying man, by what seemed a last exercise of his old tremendous will, moved his fingers, pressing the flag close up to his body in a gesture which was eloquent of loyalty. He made no other expression. And into the presence of Him who alone judges aright the sons of men, Rufus Randall's soul passed, leaving behind at least one faithful being who had given unstintedly of human affection at terrible cost of suffering.

The body was brought to Bradford. It was a very humble and quiet service that marked the funeral of the richest man in the town. And after it was all over, and the necessary business of Rufus Randall's estate had been attended to, Requa announced her intention to go at once to Palestine to join Dick.

CHAPLAIN HUNTER had an agreeable surprise for her. He had stayed on in Bradford to perfect plans for another campaign in the Federation Crusade, but a few days after Rufus Randall's death he came in to the Wards while Requa was there and read a letter he had just received from the Red Cross Headquarters at Washington:

"They want me to head the new commission going over to superintend the great reclamation works in the Esdraelon Valley. It is providential. I have just wired that I will be ready to go at once. There is a special section of trained nurses, agriculturists and mechanics going over. Requa, will you go with us? And maybe I may have the honor and pleasure of serving you and Dick over there."

Requa did not blush at thought of her coming marriage to the man whose suffering with hers had deepened the true love they both felt. But a tear of profoundest thanksgiving to a good God fell over her cheek as she turned to Chaplain Hunter with silent gratitude.

One month later Dick was in Jerusalem as the train came in from Jaffa with the Red Cross Commission. Hunter managed to get between the crowd and Dick and Requa when they met, and his big bulk interposed, in the confusion of the unloading of the train, between them and the mob on the platform. Dick said afterward that it was all unnecessary, as he saw no crowd, only a girl who came to him and put her arms about his neck as if she also was conscious of only one person in Jerusalem or all the world.

Next day, in the American Church, they were married, Chaplain Hunter performing the service, a little company of Dick's associates and personal friends present.

They had a simple evening meal at the Red Cross Headquarters, and then the friends one after another went away.

Dick said to Requa as they went out, walking through the Via Sacra and out toward the open Stephen's Gate:

"Dearest, do you know where I would like to go for our wedding journey before we come back to our room?"

"Wherever it is, dearest Dick, I will go with you anywhere, into all the world."

"Then let us go out to Bethany. Here is the road where he walked so often. I have been out here often, and facing Bethany, on that hill over there perhaps, he parted from his disciples. Shall we go?"

THEY went along the white road hand in hand like two children.

And when they had reached the little hill facing Bethany, now restored into a beautiful village, they sat down. There was much for them to say to one another. The troubles and sorrows and experiences through which they had passed had ripened and enriched their lives. The wonderful triumphs of the Cross in all lands were in their hearts. The gracious goodness of God was trembling with human happiness. And the hour was precious with coming joy.

But as they sat there in the peaceful twilight, they were silent, awed by the Presence that seemed to be still living out there "toward Bethany." And as later the electric lights along the white road began to come softly out, reminding them in bewildering thought of the new Holy Land made so by a Christian America and Great Britain and France, redeeming the desolation of the old Palestine, and making it a land free from violence and cruelty, with the gates of the city not shut at night, the same thought seemed to come to each of them.

Requa's head was on Dick's shoulder, his arm about her, as he whispered:

"What would Jesus think of this new Jerusalem, of this transformed Bethany? How he would enjoy going out to Bethany with his disciples now!"

"He is, Dick. He must be seeing all the triumphs of his Gospel now, the oneness of his disciples for which he prayed, the new Palestine which he so dearly loved."

"I am sure he does," Dick whispered. "And his Gospel will redeem all nations."

Over on Calvary the Great Cross erected by the Allied nations began to glow. It lifted up its radiance against the sky like a living thing, and Dick and Requa gazed upon it in awed silence. And then in the silence they seemed to hear that voice which once spoke within sound of where they sat, giving out the Great Commission which was to construct a new world for the nations: "Go ye into all the world and make disciples of the nations. And lo! I am with you alway, even unto the end of the ages."

el, now the wife of Dr. Richard by, and four sons, Theodore, Jr., mit, Archibald and Quentin.

'he young Roosevelt began the study aw, but quit it to go into the legis- re, being elected to three terms. He already worked himself out as a 1 for national politics, and in 1884 vas chosen as one of the state's four gates at large to the Republican onal convention at Chicago.

eeling the need of recreation, rough rcise and out-of-door interests, sevelt purchased a cattle ranch at lora, on the Little Missouri River, northwestern Dakota. The life e made him the rough rider, the pathizer with plainsmen, the com- ıder of their celebrated legion on Juan Hill, and paved the way for presidency.

owever, there was an important tical interlude in the midst of this ns life. In the year 1886 Roose-, at the age of twenty-eight, was ninated for mayor of the city of York, and ran against Abram S. vitt, Democrat, and Henry George, le tax. Hewitt was elected.

ack to the ranch for a time went the ng Roosevelt, and rode and farmed made acquaintances far and near, gathered his soul together in the t peace of the plains, and once cked down a murderous bully who atened the peace of his town.

n the West, too, he strengthened the ary faculty which he had always sessed. Here he wrote two or three is best books.

ut it was apparent that he could be kept out of national politics; in 1889 President Harrison ap- ted him a member of the national l Service Commission, in which tion he served with efficiency and inction for six years, having been pointed by Cleveland in 1893.

he Civil Service Commission was a er dormant and passive place for lynamic a man as Roosevelt. He gned May 1, 1895, and was made ident of the police board of New k City by Mayor Strong. Now he indeed plunged into the strenuous One ambition he had—to enforce laws.

is service here made him a figure of onal prominence. President McKin- appointed him Assistant Secretary he Navy. All through the months n everybody saw that a collision between this country and Spain was inevitable, and when the navy had to prepare for it as best it could, Roosevelt's hand was on the wheel.

At the outbreak of Spanish-American hostilities in April, 1898, Roosevelt's nature called irresistibly for a more active part in the struggle. A regiment of hardy volunteer cavalry, to be comprised of cowboys, hunters, plainsmen and Indians, with a sprinkling of college men and gentlemen riders from the East, was proposed for the service, and promptly became the "Rough Riders." Roosevelt declined the colonelship of the Rough Riders in behalf of his friend, Leonard Wood, and took the lieutenant-colonelship.

As a war hero he was elected Governor of New York, and nominated and elected Vice-President on the ticket with McKinley.

From the date of his accession to the presidency, through McKinley's death, until after the election of 1904, Roosevelt was under a certain constraint. In 1904 he was elected President by a popular vote of 2,523,750, and a majority over all candidates of 1,735,403.

In 1908 Colonel Roosevelt warmly supported William Howard Taft for the presidency. In 1912 Roosevelt tried for the Republican nomination and then ran for President on the Progressive ticket, but was defeated by Woodrow Wilson.

President Roosevelt's death came as a shock to the whole world; everywhere friend and foe united to praise his high Americanism, his love of liberty and his great ability. Physicians declared his death to have been due to the lodgment of a clot of blood, either in the lungs or in the brain. No one was with him when he died, although his faithful man-servant had suspected difficulty and was summoning help.

The Secretaries of the War and Navy ordered every flag flown by the armed forces of the Union everywhere to be put at half-mast. The two Houses of Congress and the Supreme Court adjourned out of respect to the former President, and flags on all public buildings throughout the Union dropped halfway, to evidence the nation's sorrow.

In one of the last letters which he dictated President Wilson, addressing the American Defense Society, made one of his characteristic pleas for one hundred per cent. Americanism, declaring that we must have one flag, one language and one country.

One of the most valuable lessons taught by the war, to be firmly set in the foundation of readjustment and reconstruction, in the opinion of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., is the value of industrial cooperation. "Only," he says, "as those who sit around the peace table are imbued with a dominating sense of the brotherhood of man will their efforts result in an outcome justifying the price paid for peace. In international affairs America sees clearly the fundamentals of reconstruction and has sought to enhance human well-being by cooperation among nations. It is to be hoped that she will bring the same clearness of vision and high purpose to the problems of national reconstruction.

Neither men nor women are going to be content in the future with the social conditions of the past. From the battlefield we have learned, as perhaps never before, the truth of democracy. We are on the eve of a new period of constructive thinking on the great abiding truths of Christianity. The universally conceded basis of the hope of a grander world lies in moral force, which is the outcome of the war. It is not economy, invention, commerce or internal improvement alone that are to be the ruling influences that will inspire the new world we all hope for and expect. The secret of all progress lies in improved citizenship; in our integrity, equality, industry, unselfishness, and what belongs to a nobler individuality.

The Teeth Problem Is Up to You

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

This You Must Decide

Do you think your present methods of teeth cleaning are sufficient to save your teeth?

We think you know they are not. Teeth still discolor, still decay. Tartar still forms on them. And most folks at some time, despite their brushing, suffer pyorrhea.

Statistics show that tooth troubles are constantly increasing, yet the tooth brush never was so widely used as now.

Science has found a reason. It lies in a film—a slimy film—which you feel with your tongue. That causes most tooth troubles.

That film is what discolors—not your teeth. It hardens into tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So that film is your teeth's great enemy.

You brush teeth and think you have cleaned them. But much of that film remains. It clings to the teeth, gets into crevices, hardens and stays.

It is doing a ceaseless damage, while you ignore it, relying on tooth-brush protection.

There is now a way to combat that film—a way proved and approved by many high authorities. It is easily used and as pleasant as any other tooth paste, but it does what nothing else can do.

That way is called Pepsodent. We urge you to try it, then decide for yourself if you want it.

A 10-Day Revelation

What we urge is a 10-day test. It will cost you nothing. Compare the results with your present results, and decide which you prefer.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it. Then, day by day, to prevent its accumulation.

The use of pepsin seems simple, but it long seemed impossible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. Today it is possible because science has found a harmless activating method. Five governments have already granted patents on it.

Dental authorities subjected Pepsodent to every form of clinical test. Years were spent in proving it before it was offered to users. Today its results are known beyond question, and dentists all over America are urging its adoption.

See what it does. Send this coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Use it like any tooth paste. Note how clean your teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the film. See how teeth whiten—how they glisten—as the fixed film disappears.

Do this for your own sake. See the effects, read the reasons for them, then judge if you want them continued. A delightful surprise awaits you. Cut out the coupon now.

that her visions of a new pair faded out, dim and far, behind Aunt Mercy's misfits.

"No sense thinking of those," she sighed. "I've got to find some other way to serve my country. I'll find one! Hear what I say!" as though addressing the long line of Blinns before her who had always found ways. She plodded resolutely on and up—to her attic. A thought gripped at her on the stairs.

"Goodness—oh, goodness, maybe he ripped everything out! It's terrible to rip out darns—"

IT REQUIRED three cups of tea of deliberate sips at a time to prepare the stage for Ardelia's new plannings. She had to have time to soothe her fresh wounds with the kind, warm drops that so far had never failed her. If she ever got beyond the gentle curative power of her tea—she must never get beyond.

"Now I'll plan," she said, at the end of the third cup. "There's serving things left for me to do an' I'll do 'em! Aunt Mercy Blinn, Uncle Mercy, some o' you,—I hope you are listening. I'm going to do something for my country that won't have to be ripped out!"

At the back of her mind was always, of course, knitting. But Ardelia shrank from that now, as she had from the beginning. The terrible loneliness of that! The long hours up here in her attic room, knitting, always knitting! It seemed to open out before her a weary, dreary perspective of knitting days. Gray days, as gray as the yarn—

"Not yet" Ardelia thought. "I may come to it." She got up briskly and washed her cup and saucer; being brisk was good practice for the new plans in the front of her mind. Ardelia was planning brisk things. Poor Ardelia! The teacup still in her hand, she crossed the narrow space to the mirror and its tiny flag. She spoke aloud, clearly.

"There's other things to do. There's nursing and driving automobiles." She held her gray head defiantly. She could —could dye her gray hair! The things she could do she would, if need came! To enable her to satisfy this aching desire to serve. The very soul of Ardelia ached.

At a great hospital, next day, she succeeded after patient hours of waiting in gaining access to the presence of a boxom white person behind a desk, who raised absent eyes from a ledger and regarded her kindly. A certain imperial dignity of kindness it was. Ardelia went straight to her point.

"I've come to be a nurse. I don't suppose nursing is terrible close to work, not terrible. I'm certain I could do it through Aunt Mer—through my glasses. I can make beef-tea and I step real light. How long will it take—to learn the rest o' the things, I mean? Making beds with folks in 'em and those things? I could begin right now—"

THE dignified kindness melted into a smile that was kind, too. The White Person leaned a little toward the strange, straight old creature confronting her.

"My dear woman!" she began, but stopped. "My dear woman" was no way to break things easily. She began once more: "A nurse's aid, you mean, I suppose. It takes a six-months' course of training here at the hospital. The training is rather severe. And, my dear woman," this was the proper place for it, "my dear woman, it requires strength, you must know, and—er—a certain degree of—er—youth—"

Ardelia winced but managed a smile. Too late now, but she should have dyed it first, before she faced this White Person in this pitiless white place. Every gray hair must stand out.

"I see" slowly nodded Ardelia, "I don't suppose I've got even a certain degree. I'm too old—that's what you mean, isn't it?"

The White Person kindly nodded. "For nursing," she said gently. But Ardelia, mentally counting on her fingers the things she was too old to do for service, was not to be deceiv She was too old, it seemed, for thing too. She turned away, straight and still determined. Out the sunny street again, she took account of her dwindling stock services. There came very near b no stock left!

A SHOW window full to overflow of knitted gray and khaki arti and heaps of wool with knitti needles suggestively waiting on top them loomed before Ardelia sudde and would not let her pass. "Sto it cried in her ears. The needles seem to lift long bony fingers and point her. The vista of gray knitting da seemed opening at her feet—long g knitting days of service. Was there other way at all? No less lonesome w to serve? To the end of her da whensoever that end should come, Ar lia Blinn would be a sociable soul w piteous longings to "sit among folk If she could sit among folks and kn

A big car was purring up to the cu and, turning about, Ardelia saw a gasped a little. It was difficult lieving instantly what she saw. T white hair of the woman behind th wheel! Not gray—white. The wom was stopping the big machine wi perfect mastery of it—doing mysterio wonders with the bright buttons in t dash—getting lightly out from behi her wheel. She was crossing the wa now toward the window and Ardeli Ardelia met her halfway.

"Oh!" breathlessly, wildly, "could do it? You've got a uniform on you're doing it for your country—co I?" The sentences were in little jer "Mine—mine's only gray an' your white, stone white! I could learn th little knobs— It can't be much wor inside those big cars than it is outsi 'em. I couldn't be much scareder i side. If you would be kind enough tell me the way to begin—"

"My dear woman!" This Kha Person was less kind than the Whi Person; she kept on. "I am real very busy indeed this morning—y must see someone else. There!" sto ping suddenly, a kind Khaki Perso after all, "I guess I can stop lo enough to be decent. There's an ag limit, I suppose—you see my ha turned white long before I was twent five; years ago." She laughed lightl "As many's ten years ago! Peop never will look twice." But Ardelia w looking twice. She was adding ten t twenty-five and subtracting the su from sixty-three. All the Blinns ha been good at "sums."

"Thank you. I won't keep you an longer," Ardelia said. The great ca beside the curb had suddenly become t her a monster of dread, outside, insid She saw herself, a shriveled little ol creature perched behind its wheel, an laughed aloud. The Khaki Perso turned and waved to her, miscon struing the sound. Ardelia waved bac

MANY blocks ahead she turne back and retraced her steps t the window of wools. She went insid

"What? Oh, yes, we furnish th yarn for knitting. This is a distributin depot. You furnish your own needle Have you knit before for us? No Well, here are printed directions for a the things; maybe you would bette begin with a scarf, say—somethin plain. It is very simple. If you hav any difficulty, come in any time and w will show you. The name, you say

"Ardelia Blinn." She answered a the questions quietly and went aw with her bundle of yarn. She seemed be stepping directly from the doorwa into that gray, lonesome lane of knittin days. But she stepped gallantly.

If Ardelia had but known, servic waited for her at the top of her atti stairs and she need not have carried i under her arm. She toiled up the stair unknowingly.

A THOUGHT—a warming thought— had come to Ardelia. She woul not be alone at her knitting for ther would be her Attic Neighbor. H would always be there, across the hall d she would feel him if she did not . She thrilled at the pleasant rmth of her thought. Why hadn't thought of that? She would leave door a very little open; perhaps would hum as she knitted, and haps the Attic Neighbor would whis- as he worked at his mysterious rk. He never had whistled, but rhaps. Ardelia was ready to hope. ready she experienced in hope a utiful sense of sitting among folks.

The Attic Neighbor's door was open, wn open by a stiff breeze through open window. Papers were littered out his room and Ardelia auto- tically stooped to pick up one that d got as far as the hall. There was one in the room. As automatically she had picked it up, Ardelia read paper in her hand. She did not an to, and it wasn't reading, anyway. was a funny looking paper, goodness! ttle lines criss-crossing and little mes to 'em—suddenly Ardelia stif- ned, grew perfectly rigid. She felt r gray hair turning white, stone ite. How she knew she could not l, but she knew that those little ames" were German words and the per was a map. Instant understand- flooded Ardelia's brain. The "spy- ss," the distant fort, the map in her nd—they were all connected, woven gether by those strange little words at were German words. Instant tion thrilled Ardelia. She darted o the Attic Neighbor's room and ught up other papers—many, any pers—and thrust them into her use. She noted the lock of the door she came out—that it had been rned but had not caught, through me inadvertence. And the wind had ne the rest.

"He thought he'd locked up," delia thought, and into the pain of r soul crept the swift wish that he had locked up. Then she would not ever have known and how she longed not ever to have known! Because knowing, she must act.

ARDELIA acted fast. She sped to the nearest police station and delivered up her papers and her neighbor. It was soon over, that part. Then on a park bench Ardelia waited a long hour—two hours—for the rest to be over. Her feet were leaden, and her pitying heart, when at last she crept back to her neighborless attic. She had performed her service to her country and it had broken her gentle heart. When she had so counted on the joy of service—joy!

Things she had, all unconsciously at the time, noticed in that little room across the hall came back to her now with pitiful clearness. The littered chairs with a ragged coat over one of them—the curtainless windows—the whole womanless, desolate little place.

"I wish I could have mended his coat first," Ardelia sobbed. "I—I wish I'd mended more things! An' better—oh, better!" She remembered the little tea-cake with the chocolate frosting and wished she had left it on his door-sill. A wave of sorrow swept over the lonely woman who had served. The very fact that she had delivered up her neighbor endowed him, by some curious law of compensation, with virtue. Ardelia had never seen him, but his face was a lonely face an' sad—she was sure it was lonely and sad. It seemed suddenly to poor Ardelia a sad and lonely world. She felt very old and her attic very empty.

She went up to her looking-glass and saluted the little flag stuck into its frame.

Then she opened her bundle of gray wool and began to knit. There did not seem to be any especial use in making tea.

John Goode's Missionary Work

NOTHING in the history of the Bowery Mission has been more gratifying than the work accom- ished by John Goode during the last elve months. During the summer onths, for several weeks, he visited veral of the mountain districts in entucky. He visited the Buckhorn strict at the urgent invitation of the v. Elmar E. Gabbard, principal the Harvey Murdoch School. The eetings were held principally in the finished building of the Bowling- wn church and schools and the re- lts achieved are best indicated by a tter Mr. Gabbard sent soon after the eetings.

"It is impossible for me to tell you hat gracious results we have had om your meetings with us in June. hat last night, which you will have no fficulty in remembering, although ings were not managed as we thought st, has meant much to our work. our school which opened in July we ve had fine cooperation from the tire district and have had an enrol- ent that surpassed our highest hopes. our presence with us and your dis- urses did much to stabilize our pro- ssing Christians and had a good fect upon the non-professing people of e community. Besides all this, it as the greatest joy to have you in e home with us. There will always a welcome awaiting you when you ish to return to Bowlingtown. When u grow tired of the labor of the great ty come down where you can get a eath from the hills and join your iends in their lowly efforts for a umble people."

In another letter recently received, r. Gabbard writes: "We have not ased to regret that you did not get come back our way as you left the entucky mountains. How pleasant would have been, and profitable as ell, to talk over with you the experi- nces of the summer! You must come ack to us at the very first opportunity. welcome always awaits you, and our messages will do our people ood."

Mr. Goode has also recently held any successful services at Rochester, ew Hampshire. Here he was en- ertained by Mr. Edwin I. Niles of Merrill's Corner. The meetings were held at the Friends' Meeting House, and Mr. Niles writes as follows: "Allow me to express my appreciation of the good work done by Mr. Goode. I certainly think that he made some very fine hits. He gave the best of satisfaction in the work which he did. It has kindled a deep interest for the Bowery Mission in our hearts."

Those who have read the book "The Wicked John Goode" and have had their hearts stirred by the story will be glad to know that this devoted man is accomplishing such a work. There are many demands for his services, but he is always ready to go where he can be used of God. Any church or mission that desires to have his services may address their application to Mr. A. C. Baker, Assistant Superintendent of the Bowery Mission, New York City.

The Bowery Mission's Tribute

AT A recent meeting in the Bowery Mission, New York, after the service, the following resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God to take from our midst our great friend, the Rev. John Wilbur Chapman, late Moderator of the Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and evangelist of world-wide fame; and

"Whereas, Dr. Chapman was one of the Incorporators of the Bowery Mission, and has always manifested the deepest interest in its welfare,

"We, the members of the congregation assembled in the Bowery Mission on Sunday evening, December 29, 1918, desire to place on record our gratitude to Almighty God for the immeasurable amount of good that has been accomplished throughout the world by this gifted and devoted man of God. Especially do we acknowledge the sympathy and practical help rendered to Rescue Mission work by Dr. Chapman, not only in New York City but throughout Christendom.

"We also wish to send a copy of this resolution to Mrs. Chapman, with an expression of our sincere sympathy and condolence in this hour of her deep grief and irreparable loss."

as far as it went, but it did not solve the mystery of the future life, nor make him sure of how he was to stand in that other world to which Death stood ready to escort him presently. After turning it over for some days he reached the conclusion that God was the only one who could help him. God was the beginning of it all; if there was a God, he must know and be available to help a soul in a time like this. There must be a way to find God and get the secret of life, and so be ready to meet Death and go into the other existence. How could one find God? Had anybody ever found him? Did any think they had found him? These were the questions that beat in upon his soul day after day as he drilled his men and went through the long, hard days of discipline, or lay upon his straw tick at night while a hundred and fifty other men slept about him. His mother's secret, frail attempts at a religion had been too feeble and too hidden in her own breast, to have made much of an impression upon him. She had only hoped her faith was founded upon a rock. She had not known, and so her buffeted soul had never given any evidence of any hidden refuge for her son to flee to in his time of need.

NOW and then the vision of a girl blurred across his thoughts uncertainly, like a bright moth hovering in the distance whose shadow fell across his dusty path. But it was far away and vague, and only a glance in her eyes belonged to him. She was not of his world.

He looked up to the yellow sky through the yellow dust, and his soul cried out to find the way to God before he had to meet Death, but the heavens seemed like molten brass. Not that he was afraid of death with a physical fear, but that his soul recoiled from being conquered by it, and he felt convinced there was a way to meet it with a smile of assurance, but he did not know it. He had read that people had met it that way. Was it all imagination? The mere illusion of a fanatical brain? Well, he would try to find out God. As the days and the drill went on he decided that he would put himself in the places where God ought to be, and when he saw any indication that God was there, he would cry out till he made God hear him!

The day he came to that conclusion was Sunday. There was no drill, and he went over to the Y. M. C. A. auditorium. They were having a Mary Pickford moving picture there. If he had happened to go at any time in the morning he might have heard some fine sermons, and perhaps have found the right man to help him; but this was evening, and the men were being amused.

He stood for a few minutes and watched the pretty show. The sunlight on Mary's beautiful hair, glimmering through trees in the picture, reminded him of the red-gold lights on Ruth Macdonald's hair the morning he left home, and with a sigh he turned away and walked out to the edge of the camp where the woods were still standing.

ALONE he looked up to the skies. Amusement was not what he wanted now. He was in search of something vague and great that would satisfy, and give a reason for being and suffering and dying, perhaps. He called it God because he had no other name for it. Red-gold hair might be for others, but not for him. He might not take it where he would, and he would not take it where it lay easy to get. If he had been in the same class with other fellows he would have wasted no time on follies. He would have gone for the very highest, finest woman. But there! What was the use? Besides, even if he had been, and had had . . . Every joy of life here was but a passing show, and must some time come to an end. Some time he would have had to realize this, even if war had not come and brought the revelation prematurely. What was it that he wanted? Where was God? How could he find out how to die?

But the stars were high and cold and gave no answer, and the whispering leaves, although they soothed him, sighed and gave no help.

The feeling was still with him next morning when the mail was distributed. There was nothing for him. His mother had written her weekly letter, and it had reached him the day before. He could expect nothing for several days now. Other men were getting sheaves of letters. How friendless he seemed among them all! One had a great chocolate cake that a girl had sent him, and the others were crowding around to get a bit. It was doubtful if the laughing owner got more than a bite himself. He might have been one of the group if he chose. They all liked him well enough, although they knew him very little as yet. But he turned sharply away from them all and went out. It was an awful feeling to be so alone! He felt he must be growing morbid, but somehow he could not throw it off that morning. It all seemed so hopeless, the things he had tried to do and the slow progress he had made upward, and now to have it all blocked by war!

NONE of the fellows ever dreamed he was lonely, great big husky, handsome fellow that he was, with a continual joke on his lips for those he had chosen as associates; with an arm of iron and a jaw that set like steel, grim and unmistakably brave. The awkward squad as they obeyed his stern orders would have told you he had no heart the way he worked them, and would not have believed that he was just plain homesick and lonesome for some one to care for him.

He was not hungry that day when the dinner-call came, and flung himself down under a scrub oak outside the barracks while the others rushed in with their mess kits, ready for beans or whatever was provided for them. He was glad they were gone, glad that he might have the luxury of being just plain miserable all alone for a minute. He felt strangely as if he were going to cry, and yet he didn't know what about. Perhaps he was going to be sick. That would be horrible, down in that new half-finished hospital, with hardly any equipment there yet! He must brace up and put an end to such softness. It was all in the idea anyway.

Then a great hand came down upon his shoulder with a mighty slap, and he flung himself bolt upright with a frown, to find his soldier comrade, whose bunk was next to his in the barracks. He towered over Cameron polishing his tin plate with vigor.

"What's the matter with you, you boob? There's roast beef and it's good! Cooky saved a piece for you. I told him you'd come. Go in and get it quick! There's a letter for you, too, in the office. I'd have brought it, only I was afraid I'd miss you. Here, take my mess kit and hurry! There's some crackerjack pickles, too—little sweet ones! Step lively, or some one will swipe them!"

Cameron arose, accepted his friend's dishes, and sauntered into the mess hall. A letter! It couldn't be very important. His mother had no time to write again so soon, and no one else would write. It was likely an advertisement, or some formal greeting from some organization at home. They did that about fortnightly. It was kind in them, but he wasn't very enthusiastic about it. It could wait till he got his dinner. They didn't have roast beef every day, and, now he thought about it, he was hungry.

He almost forgot the letter after dinner until a comrade called after him and handed it over, a square, sweet-scented affair with a silver crest on the back. The boys got off a bit of kidding about the "girl he left behind him" and he answered with his old good-natured grin that made them love him, and let them think he had all kinds of girls, for the dinner had somewhat restored his spirits, but he crumpled the letter into his pocket and went into the woods to read it.

Deliberately he walked down the yellow road, and up over the hill by the signal corps tents, across the Wig-wag Park to the woods beyond, and sa himself down on a log to read his letter He told himself that it was probably one of those fool letters from some silly girl who was crazy over a uniform and wanted the romance of writing to a stranger. He wouldn't answer it, o course, and he felt a kind of contemp with himself for being weak enough to read it.

Then he tore the letter open hal viciously, and a faint whiff of violet floated out to him. Over his head a meadow lark trilled a long, swee measure, and surprise suddenly entere into his soul.

The Vexed Question

Part II

"I AM writing to you in the interest of 'girls' who have to earn their living by housework. I am not amed to call them 'servants' and to knowledge that I once belonged to eir class. I know that lots of them very faithful. I want my family to ve just as much respect for a hard-rking girl as for one who is supported thout work. I wish you would write this matter of domestic service! is a problem that needs attention d is too little understood.

"I cannot tell you how it grieves me hear of the bitter feeling that exists tween employers and employees. ore than once I have been able to ow a foolish girl how she was bar-ing a clean conscience and a good me (often her only assets) for paltry n. I have, in all my life, met but who spurned my advice, and she s hopeless in every respect. I have t heard from a 'mistress' who has n a housekeeper for fifty years and o tells me of keeping maids for eight, and twelve years. That proves t she gives them a home as well as place to work in. And I believe re are many such."—Mrs. A. S. (ashington).

OUR Western member's temperate tone and discreet utterances win our dial respect. She was fully aware in lier life that her profession was as nest and honorable as a queen's—so g as she respected it—as it is now at she is richer in worldly goods. I proud to count among my life-ng friends at least half a dozen who ce occupied the place of domestics my household and retained their ces for long terms of years. Now at they are in homes of their own, most amicable relations are main-ned.

I account it a notable coincidence at, just as I had written the last rd set down above, another com-nication dealing with the same sub-t came to my hand. As a lover of r play I insert the main body of the ter here without further preamble:

"I WAS very much interested in your article, 'Cooks and Copartnership,' o in the article of 'Perplexed House-fe.' As I have been a servant myself, d associated with servants, I can eak from experience. May I give my inion on the subject?

"My dear mistresses! If you have mebody to work for you, first of all actice the Golden Rule—'Do to hers as you would that they should to you.'

"There is entirely too much distinc-on between the mistress and the maid. or people have hearts and feelings, st the same as the rich. And the poor ople are not all ignorant.

"There are quite a number of girls at work in mills and factories who uld rather do housework if they ere not classed so much lower than e mistress. If you have a servant, ll her by her name. Do not introduce r to your friends as, 'This is my ok' or, 'This is my chambermaid,' as good many people do. Just call r Mary Smith, or whatever her me may be.

"Give her a nice airy room on the cond floor. Do not give her a small, ingy room in the garret, where it is o hot in summer and too cold in inter. Do not always let her sit in e kitchen alone, when she has a w leisure hours, but let her sit in the brary occasionally. We servants like read.

"Make her feel at home with you; cognize her on the street, and you ll gain the love and confidence of our servants. They will do their ery best to serve and please you, and ke care of your house, home and hildren, and economize for you and ith you just the same as if they worked r themselves.

"It is now twenty-eight years since worked as a servant, but I still love my mistress dearly. She taught me how to economize; how to manage; how to be a good housekeeper. She guided me like a loving mother through the years when a young girl has lots of temptations. I love her and would do anything for her."—Mary J. H. (Pennsylvania).

I HAVE purposely refrained from "editing" this letter, for reasons that will be apparent to those who can see both sides of a subject. The like motive moves me to throw open the Vexed Question to thoughtful, right-minded Cornerites who are sincere in their desire to put the Golden Rule into hourly practice.

Harking back to the fundamental law laid down in the first paper of our series, I would remind our correspondents that certain business regulations which prevail in offices and factories must be recognized in the household. The clerk is as respectable in his place as his principal is in his. But certain forms of address, regulations as to the times and manner of approach, etc., are essential to the decorous progress of business. So far as a common humanity and virtuous womanhood go, mistress and maid are equals. Circumstance and convention set them in different stations. I repeat that the maid who really respects her position and herself will be ready to recognize this fact and to comport herself accordingly.

ONE word as to bedchamber and sitting-room. I speak for a vast majority of housemothers when I assert that the maids in my employ are lodged as comfortably and with as much regard for healthfulness in the matter of sunlight and air as I could wish my own daughters to be, were they inmates of another's house. Moreover, the kitchen is light and comfortable the year round, and when the day's work is done is as cozily inviting as the library—albeit more plainly furnished. There are reasons why we should make and keep our maids contented with their appointments, besides benevolence and justice. Policy, if not Christian charity, would keep us up to our duty in these respects.

Many years ago I fitted up a room adjoining the kitchen as a sitting-room for my servants. It had a sunny outlook; the walls were painted prettily; pictures hung here and there, and the furniture was neat, and even luxurious. I had my ideals in that line, and I put them into practice gladly. For a year that parlor remained practically disused, and finally became the laughing-stock of the "girls" in neighboring kitchens. One and all, they decided that the kitchen was "more sociable-like," and conformed to the conviction. It was a mortifying experience that taught me the folly of startling innovations. With this confession of one failure, I leave the suggestion of the library sitting-room to readers and members.

They will agree with me as to the gratification we feel in the discovery that a maid is "fond of reading," and the willingness with which we lend her books, and pass along papers and magazines for her use.

I could multiply instances of cordial understanding and friendship between the two classes that should never be antagonistic, and which need not be if there is a right, mutual understanding as to the boundaries and respective obligations of the two.

The correspondent whose letter supplied the caption of these two Familiar Talks says truly that this is the most important and difficult problem with which American housewives have to deal. This is my apology for the expenditure of time and space which might seem needless to the casual reader. Members are invited to contribute suggestions that—as dear George Herbert says of the star-ray:

> "Shot o'er a cloud,
> May clear much way
> And guide a crowd."

On Quaker Oats at the Cost of a Single Chop Measured by calories—the energy unit—one chop has about the same food value as a dish of Quaker Oats.

The dish of oats costs one-half cent. The chop costs ten times that or more.

So with many foods. Meats, eggs and fish will average more than ten times Quaker Oats' cost. The average mixed diet will cost five times as much for the same energy units.

Think what that means. A meat breakfast for one will cost as much as a Quaker Oats breakfast for ten—for an equal energy value.

And the Quaker Oats breakfast means vastly better feeding. The oat is almost a complete food—the greatest food we have.

Yet each 32-cent package saves about $3.00, if used to displace meat.

The best way to cut down your food cost is to breakfast on Quaker Oats.

Israel Crossing the Red Sea

International Sunday School Lesson for January 26
Ex. 14 : 1 to 15 : 21

The Challenge of a Great Deliverance

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WE COME today to that part of Exodus that appeals most strongly to the imagination—so vividly told it is, so exciting an escape, so wonderful a deliverance. During the whole history of Israel the poets sang of it and the prophets drew its national and personal lessons. The crossing of the Red Sea is as conspicuous an illustration of the hand of Providence in the life of a race as the experience of Joseph furnishes us in the career of an individual.

We have had a remarkably similar incident in the midst of the stirring events of recent history, namely the flooding of the Piave River just after the great Italian retreat and before the bulk of the Austrian army could follow. Every Sunday school teacher should show his class the Christian Herald of December 11 last with its leading article "How God Saved Venice," by Dr. Alexander Robertson. Surely every devout man in the Italian rearguard gave thanks unto God for his providence when the roaring, rushing flood swept away the enemy pontoons and bridges.

Realizing God's Daily Care

It takes the unusual to elicit the average believer's gratitude to the Almighty. We are so apt to forget the common mercies of every day that a signal deliverance from an obvious danger is needed to call forth our appreciation.

But the great spirits are those that know the daily ministries of the unseen, and in time of stress are ready to rely upon God for special mercies if in his great wisdom they are necessary. Jesus himself had a calm faith that his Father was concerned in all the varied happenings of life. "Not a sparrow falleth to the ground without your Father," he said. This does not mean that all events are equally important, or unimportant, to God! It means a serene certainty that the Lord will provide—that he is never taken unawares by any emergency.

This same spirit was in Moses long before. The children of Israel were already dismayed when the host of Pharaoh started to pursue them, but Moses trusted the unseen guide, crying, "Stand fast and see the salvation of Jehovah." He was sure that he who called them forth out of Egypt would see them through the perils of the way. Have we a like faith with regard to our own Christian experience? Can we truly sing, "All the way my Saviour leads me, what have I to ask beside?"

For the blessedness of trust in daily and emergent guidance, read Whittier's "The Eternal Goodness":

"I know not what the future hath
 Of marvel or surprise,
Assured alone that life and death
 His mercy underlies.

"I dimly guess from blessings known
 Of greater out of sight,
And, with the chastened Psalmist, own
 His judgments too are right."

The Meaning of the Deliverance

This great intervention surely convinced Moses that God had a plan and a future for Israel. It was in a way a reassurance of divine purposes and divine protection. Yet it in no way released him or his followers from responsibility. They must still do all that they could. In the very hour of providence the Lord said, "Wherefore criest thou to me? Go forward!" It is always thus with redeemed men—the "blessed assurance" brings with it the challenge of a commission to be fulfilled, a sense of being saved to serve, a realization that one must not sit down even to sing the song of praise. The song of Moses and the Lamb is a marching song! It rings like "Onward, Christian Soldiers!" The majestic Hebrew poetry which closes our lesson text, Ex. 15, is no lullaby! It is a stirring battle hymn of a nation's progress — no mere war-song either, but a challenge to future zeal and loyalty.

What message has the great deliverance by the Red Sea for us and our nations just now—for the United States, for Canada and for Britain? We too have just had our great deliverance. Over us the awful menace of a modern Pharaoh hung, frightful with its enginery of destruction, more terrible than the horses and chariots of Egypt. Suddenly we were delivered! The war ended as abruptly as it began. We thank our great leaders, counterparts in patience and ability of Moses. We thank our loyal soldiers and sailors and workers. With them we give the glory also to God, who once more hath put down the mighty from their seats! But our great deliverance brings its great challenge too. "Go forward!" is the Holy Spirit's watchword to the churches and the nations. It is not enough to dethrone Potsdam; we must enthrone Bethlehem. We went to war to break down the power of autocracy, but more than that to build up democracy. Splendid as Mr. Roosevelt was, he erred when he said that we made so mighty an effort "to smash Germany" and nothing else. The Christian manhood of the free nations smashed Germany because men realized that Germany blocked the pathway of the Kingdom of God on earth. Now that the obstacle has been removed, the Kingdom must advance. For a while the big task was destructive, now like Moses on the farther shores of the Bitter Lakes we must begin to rebuild the peoples.

Let us be glad that the Church of Christ hears his command to "go forward" just now. She realizes that a new and Christian epoch has but begun. Presbyterianism launches a "New Era Movement." Methodism raises the banner of its Centenary Movement for reconstruction in the name and spirit of the Christ. The Baptists start their "victory campaign" centering in Christian missions throughout the world. The other denominations feel the stir and the challenge of the hour.

Its Meaning to the Individual

But churches and sects are only great aggregations of individual Christians. Does the individual member catch the vision? Do you feel the personal challenge of the God of providence and power? What does it mean to your class in the Bible school, who have learned something big in national service by Liberty Bonds, Thrift Stamps and the rest? We must not let our youth slump back into the old small and selfish ways of thinking. The Kingdom of Christ must call as insistently and as gloriously to us all as the Marne and the Meuse called a year ago!

As a result of the deliverance by the sea it is written of Israel that they "feared Jehovah, and they believed in Jehovah, and in his servant Moses." Truly the awe-inspiring events of the World War and its wonderful close awakens in each thoughtful spirit a godly fear, a solemn realization of the holiness of our God. Its outcome has strengthened our faith that right is more than might, that God rules and overrules the destinies of men and of nations. We also believe that God has still his chosen servants and that we do well to follow them loyally in their noble ideals for his world. Friends, let us so teach this great Bible lesson with its vivid application to this year of our Lord 1919, that the children of America, like the children of Israel long ago, may fear the Lord, and believe in the Lord and in his servants. Send them forth with a firm trust that God is with us now and calls us to press on.

MERICANS Defeat Bolsheviki. American and Allied troops on the ssian front south of Archangel, on cember 30 and 31, fighting in snow- es in four feet of snow, defeated and ve back superior forces of Bolshe- i, thus securing possession of villages l farmsteads providing adequate nter quarters. There were reports t the Bolsheviki had mutilated nerican wounded. In the Baltic vinces of Russia the retiring Ger- ns were reported to be selling their ns and ammunition to the Bolsheviki ose armies, following the Germans, re said to be burning buildings and aging the country. Riga was re- ted on January 4 to be in their nds but under bombardment by Brit- ships and the fall of Vilna and Brest- ovsk was imminent. Budapest on nuary 4 was reported as threatened h a Bolshevik uprising.

Germany Talks Peace. Reports ough Copenhagen on January 4 oted Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau, new German Foreign Minister, as ing that "No peace must be signed ich differs by the breadth of a hair m the principles of President Wilson's rteen points." German newspapers nmenting on this declared that Ger- ny must not yield to a dictated peace. eanwhile the papers were demanding raising of an army to fight the eatened Bolshevik invasion from Rus- and the various parties were again ganizing to discuss their interests d to plan for the new constitution. e campaign for delegates to the Con- tuent Assembly was warming up ile the Ebert Government was begin- g to show real courage in resisting terrorists. On January 7 Berlin s reported as torn by civil war follow- an attempted coup d'état by the ds.

Poles March to Berlin. A Polish my on January 2 was marching to- rd Berlin on what was described as a leadly raid into Germany." It had ached Frankfort on the Oder, 50 les east of Berlin, and had captured a ge amount of rolling stock and mate- l. The force was reported to number out 30,000 men.

To Form Irish Republic. London spatches of December 31 declared that e situation in Ireland was causing ave anxiety. It was declared that e 73 Sinn Fein members elected to rliament were planning to meet in ublin and constitute themselves into an ish National Assembly. Their plans cluded the appointment of a Presi- nt and the proclamation of the inde- ndence of the Irish republic. They ere also said to be planning a delega- on to the Peace Conference.

Dr. Wherry Dies in China. The ev. Dr. John Wherry, for half a cen- ry engaged in missionary work in hina, died in that country on January Dr. Wherry, after eighteen years of ork, had just completed translating the ible into classical literary Chinese.

Fourteen Protestant Churches o Start Drive. The Interchurch mergency Campaign Committee, rmed by fourteen Protestant Churches, nnounced on January 5 that its cam- aign for a fund of $10,000,000 for work mong the soldiers after their return ould begin soon. Among the plans for he work are the enlisting of additional haplains for the soldiers, expansion of churches at debarkation stations, provision of books and other supplies to army and navy chaplains, scholarships for soldiers and sailors, the restoration of evangelical churches in the devastated regions of Europe, and the assistance of negro churches.

The Railroad Situation. William G. McAdoo appeared before the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee on January 3 and 4 to give his reason for favoring the extension of the Government's control of railroads to five years after the conclusion of peace. He declared that the five years' control was the only fair test, and that the present limit of 21 months was sure to throw the question into the political arena of 1920. The heads of the railroads, in a special session of railway executives in Philadelphia on January 5, opposed the five-year proposition and prepared a proposal of their own to be submitted to Congress.

Hoover Captain General of Relief. It was announced in Rome, on January 3, that President Wilson had designated Herbert Hoover to take charge of the relief work of the world, the other allies having agreed to the appointment. Mr. Hoover gave out a statement to the effect that surveys had shown that Germany had enough stocks of food except fat to carry her for a while, but that immediate relief was imperative in Belgium, Northern France, the Trentino, Serbia, Montenegro, Rumania, Czecho-Slovakia, Jugo-Slavia, Poland, Finland, the Baltic States of Russia and in Armenia and Syria, populations aggregating probably 125,000,000 persons being faced with imminent starvation. President Wilson cabled an appeal to Congress to provide at once a fund of $100,000,000 to provide for the relief of urban populations in regions outside of Germany where industry was so prostrated and life so disorganized that the people could not purchase food. Legislation to provide the money was instituted at once.

Poincaré Will Visit America. President Poincaré of France announced on January 6 that he would visit America in midsummer, to thank America and Americans for what they have done for the cause of liberty and for France.

The New Regular Army. Secretary Baker, on January 3, told the House Military Committee that the War Department would recommend a bill to provide for a Regular Army of 500,000 as a temporary measure to carry the nation over until the peace terms are decided. This army would be raised by voluntary enlistment. The department does not now contemplate recommending universal military training.

Again the small craft came alongside and the bed-ridden heroes were swung out over the side of the ship in navy litters, set gently on the waiting decks and swung up again shortly to the Solace, which brought them into port. Work was begun promptly to lighten the ship, preparatory to further attempts to pull her into deep water.

The Good Old Gospel

OUT of the turmoil of war will come many things, but it won't be a new Gospel, says Chaplain Ridout, whose letter direct to the Editor from the front continues next week our discussion of "The Church after the War."

But out of the thinking and praying of the last few months has come a new united movement of Protestantism. We report this next week.

Next week, too, Dr. Cadman swings aloft the light that will lighten the Gentiles.

And next week John Cameron and Harry Wainwright cross each other's paths and trouble is narrowly averted, but John has that letter.

OVEN BAKED BEANS

Beans, to be appetizing, brown and wholesome, must be baked—actually baked in dry heat in real ovens. That is the Heinz way. There is no short cut. Beans may be boiled or steamed and put into cans, and that is usually done because it is cheaper, but the result is very different.

The beans themselves also vary in quality, and even the best quality must be carefully picked over—that also is the Heinz way. The best quality, utmost care, skillful cooks and baking in ovens—all go to produce in Heinz Baked Beans a dish so satisfying to the family as to be ever welcome.

To suit all tastes, Heinz Beans are prepared in four ways:

Heinz Baked Beans with Pork and Tomato Sauce
Heinz Baked Pork and Beans (without Tomato Sauce) Boston style
Heinz Baked Beans in Tomato Sauce without Meat (Vegetarian)

10 WONDERFUL VIEWS OF THE HOLY LAND

HERE is a great opportunity for you to secure ten beautiful reproductions in full color of the most famous and accurate Holy Land paintings that have ever been made. These works of a great artist have preserved to the world the Holy Land of Bible days, that country known and loved so well by our Saviour.

In the past you have known the Holy Land only through the most meager and uninspired dressings, none of them presenting this wonderful country in its true beauty and charm. Now you are offered masterpieces that put before your eyes the entire birthplace of Christianity as Christ himself knew it. For the first time ten of these views in all the beautiful tints and shades of the land itself are offered you.

Like a Visit to Palestine

As you look at these pictures you feel that you yourself stand with the artist on the slope of Olivet and look across the valley of Jehoshaphat, through which winds the old road to Samaria, and beyond, under the bright sunshine, you see the walls of Jerusalem. Through these works of art you travel the Jordan road as did our Saviour so many years ago. You visit the Pool of Bethesda, and the tomb of St. James, and feel the charm, the beauty, and the dignity of every sacred place. These reproductions are in themselves a trip to the Holy Land.

David Roberts, of the Royal Academy, made the long trip from England for the purpose of painting the most famous scenes of biblical history in order that the Christian world might have truthful pictures of the birthplace of the religion. He expressed in water-colors the scenes of Christ's life and activities, as well as many things of historical interest in Egypt and the Nile country, the very cradle of modern civilization, which he visited while on his way to Palestine. Reproductions of ten of Mr. Roberts' great paintings have been made and are now offered you in folio form. The booklet is 4½ x 9½ inches. Every picture is worthy of framing.

With each of the ten pictures goes a complete description of the scene depicted with mention of the historical and biblical interest that attaches to the place. Every student of the Bible and every person interested in the life and progress of these early days will appreciate the beauty and value of these reproductions, both as works of art and as illustrations of the great scenes in scriptural history.

CHRISTIAN HERALD SUBSCRIPTION OFFERS

"JERUSALEM—Its Redemption and Future"

IT IS only now that the real story of the Redemption of Jerusalem can be told and it is that story which the Christian Herald presents in the book entitled "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future." It tells the story in vivid detail of conditions in the Holy City during the war.

The book reads like the unfolding of a vast drama, one of the grandest ever known. The redemption is not confined to Palestine, but includes all the Bible lands: Syria, Armenia, Arabia, Mesopotamia, the old country of the patriarchs, and even the "Eden Land"—the cradle of the human race. It is a volume which should be in the possession of every Christian man and woman in America, as it is plentifully illuminative of the fulfilment of God's pledge which is being brought about in a remarkable way in our lifetime. Illustrated with fifteen pages of beautiful pictures from the Holy Land.

We will send a copy of "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.00.

We will send a copy of "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.50.

"Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," separately, $1.00 per copy, postpaid.

Gene Stratton-Porter's Novels

Special Edition of Six Volumes

BY special arrangement with the publishers of Mrs. Porter's works, we procured a special edition of six volumes of the most popular stories by this talented writer. The first edition of these books was quickly taken by our readers. Another edition has just been received. The six volumes were printed from the plates used in the original edition—the type being large and clear and the paper of exceptional quality. The books are bound in fine cloth with gilt tops—twenty-five full-page illustrations.

We have only a limited number of this second edition. Those who desire this set of six volumes should order them at once.

The titles are as follows: "At the Foot of the Rainbow"; "The Harvester"; "The Girl of the Limberlost"; "Freckles"; "Laddie—A True-Blue Story"; and "Song of the Cardinal."

We will send this set of 6 volumes of Mrs. Porter's books, prepaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $5.00. Payment can be made in 5 monthly installments of $1.00 each if preferred.

Killing a Million Armenians

Ambassador Morgenthau's Revelations

AS GERMANY is now suing fo peace, it is important that th world should know some things sh has tried to keep secret.

This inside history and much more, all significant and breathlessly interesting, is in "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story." This book tells why the Turks killed 1,000,000 Armenians and fixes on the Germans the responsibility for the atrocities. It reveals the perfidy of Germany's attempt to start a holy war against Christians. It is the kind of a book that keeps one reading on and on. It is entertainingly written, yet it i packed full of authoritative facts. Illustrated with photographs, maps and diagrams. Over 400 pages; cloth bound.

We will send a copy of "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.50.

"Oh, Money! Money!"

By* Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna," etc.

"OH, MONEY! MONEY!" is a romance of a New England Cinderella and a Western millionaire. "If you don't know how to get happiness out of five dollars, you don't know how to get it out of five thousand," says Maggie, the cheery philosopher of "Oh, Money! Money!" and this is the keynote of Mrs. Porter's latest story. Out of a clear sky came three checks to the three Blaisdell families. How each family tried in its own way to get happiness from its unexpected fortune—and failed; and how poor Maggie, without trying and without a fortune, succeeded, is told in "Oh, Money! Money!"

We will send a copy of "Oh, Money! Money!" postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.00.

We will send a copy of "Oh, Money! Money!" postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.50.

"Oh, Money! Money!" separately, $1.50 per copy, postpaid.

The Most Precious Metals

RESENTATIVES of the War Industies Board have set forth the sudden eat increase of the government demand atinum, iridium and palladium. The ment's estimate of requirements was ounces in March, 1918, and this demand sed to 69,000 in June. For the year he world's production of crude platinum bout 313,000 ounces troy, and for 1917 33,000 ounces; thus at present there ained from all the mines only 26½ nt. of the pre-war output. In 1913 was credited with 95 per cent. of the and in 1917 only 60 per cent. Iridium ciated with platinum, and the supply metal is for the most part obtained he platinum deposits of Russia. Plati- was discovered in Colombia, South ca, in 1735. In 1810 it commanded rom 30 to 40 cents an ounce. It was in Russia in 1819. In 1828 it had a of about $7 an ounce. Since 1914 platinum has risen from $45 to $105 an ounce, iridium $65 to $175, and palladium $44 to $135, the government fixed prices. Platinum and its associates are far more rare than gold. In the 1917 report of the Geological Survey, it was shown that the estimated output of gold by weight has been in the neighborhood of from 80 to 100 times that of platinum. Government regulations prevented further manufacture of platinum for all ornamental and non-essential purposes during the duration of the war, and it was believed that in case of great need the women of the country would be willing to give up their platinum ornaments for the benefit of their country. The important requirements of platinum compounds aside from their use in chemical industry include contact points in magnetos for airplanes, trucks, automobiles, also telegraph instruments, etc., and for laboratory apparatus.

1/3 Less Coal-
1/2 More Heat

You can use from a third to a half less fuel and have a much warmer home than ever before if you will install a CALORIC.

We have hundreds of letters from enthusiastic users in all sections of the country that prove what we say beyond any question. Read these typical letters:

Irwin Lamb, Lancaster, O., writes that in his ten-room house, "All winter, the coldest Central Ohio has had in my lifetime, we burned ONLY SIX TONS of soft coal to keep us warm through all the house."

N. I. Stearns, Brookings, S. D., says he kept his eight-room house comfortable all winter, even when the temperature dropped to 30° below, at a total consumption of ONLY FOUR TONS of coal.

PIPELESS CALORIC FURNACE
TRADE MARK REGD
The Original Patented Pipeless Furnace

The CALORIC is the remarkable furnace that heats without pipes, through only one register. It circulates heat by Nature's own method, forcing warm air up into the entire house and drawing cool air down into the furnace to be reheated and purified.

The CALORIC heats practically all types of homes, bungalow or three-story house, up to eighteen rooms. It keeps kitchens and back bedrooms just as comfortable and warm as the rest of the house. Also heats churches, factories, stores and other business buildings. More than 50,000 already installed.

CALORIC
WATER PAN

The CALORIC can be installed in new or old houses—no cutting of walls for pipes and no interference with present system of heating. It burns coal, coke, gas, wood or lignite, and saves from one-third to one-half the fuel.

Let the CALORIC dealer tell you the interesting CALORIC story. If you do not know him we'll send you his name, a copy of the Monitor Ironclad Guarantee and other literature which will show why the CALORIC backs up every claim.

Write us by tonight's mail.

TREE IN WINTER
SAME TREE IN SUMMER

Is Your Furniture Like A Winter's Tree?

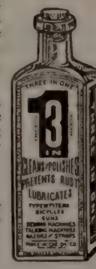
IN WINTER a tree is not fed the life-giving sap that nourishes and makes it grow. Consequently, the leaves fall off, the trunk, branches and twigs take on a dull, lifeless appearance and the wood becomes brittle and unattractive. The tree would die if the sap did not return in the Spring.

The same principle applies to wood after it is made into furniture. Furniture must be fed a nourishing substance or it will become shabby, brittle and lifeless in appearance. The wood will crack and chip and the furniture in but a few years will be ready for the ash heap.

3-in-One is a scientifically prepared pure oil compound that takes the place of nature when wood becomes furniture. Just a little applied with a soft cloth every once in a while penetrates and nourishes the wood properly. And while doing this, 3-in-One also removes all exterior wear marks and the natural grain and finish of the wood is restored like new.

The finer the furniture the more it needs 3-in-One and you will realize this if you but try it once.

You can get 3-in-One at any good hardware, drug, grocery, housefurnishing or general store. East of the Rocky Mountain States, 15c, 25c and 50c in bottles; also in Handy Oil Cans, 25c. Or if you want to try 3-in-One before you buy



Send for Free 3-in-One

Just mail us a postal card and we will forward enough 3-in-One for several pieces of furniture and also full instructions how to use it.

Vapo Cresolene
USED WHILE YOU SLEEP

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs.

Established 1879

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs.

Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold.

Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp."

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights.

It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers.

For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities.

It is a protection to those exposed.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 39 years of successful use.

Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet. Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. in stamps.

Catching Up With Columbus

Epworth League Topic. John 10 : 10; Mark 6 : 30–44

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS discovered America when he sought the Indies. The Methodist Church in its first conference of the Centenary Program at Columbus discovered its power while it developed its program. In June it will be 100 years since the first foreign missionary of Methodism set forth to execute the Great Commission. Today with every field wide open, with thousands holding out hands of appeal to the church to set before them the bread of life, Methodism proposes to meet the challenge of world opportunity by putting into the hands of the Lord her loaves and fishes, and by becoming his messengers to set the multiplied bounty before the world-girdling multitude. It is an ambitious program. It involves some millions in money. But if it stopped there it would be defeated before it began. The Centenary Program demands also a church-wide consecration. of life, of purpose, of talent to the business of the King. It demands a 100% Christian life. It shames one-day-in-seven religion and spare-change giving. It calls to a faith that falters at no sacrifice, a faith that conquers sacrifice and makes it opportunity. It calls for a threefold witness of tongue, time and talent, a witnessing life that shall so shame by its straightforward purity the ugliness of sin as to compel repentance and impel to faith. The Centenary Program is not a pink tea; it is a call to battle. If the leader is not familiar with the program he should be able to secure information from his pastor; if the pastor is uninformed, full information may be secured by addressing the Centenary Commission, 111 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Books That Have Helped Me

Christian Endeavor Topic. Proverbs 2 : 1–9

BETWEEN the covers of the world's books lie all that is worthy and all that is vile, all that tends upward and all that drags downward. One book will be a fountain of life, another a sink of iniquity; and he who reads the good books lays up a treasure that increases with each hour's reading, while he who reads the others soon loses the ability to tell good from evil. Many a blunted conscience has lost its edge in the pages of an unworthy book. But thousands of great men and of men whose souls were great, even if the world never learned to chant their names, have laid the foundations of their greatness in the reading of good books.

The Bible has been the foundation of more greatness than any other book. It is THE good book. It furnished the silken web from which was spun the eloquence of Webster and the beautifully simple diction of Lincoln. It was the rock on which rested the indomitable courage of Washington and of Lee. It was the cement that gave Jackson the sobriquet of "Stonewall." In our own day the men who have won splendid victories, Foch, Pershing, Allenby, all are men who have built their lives on the old book, men of faith and prayer. It seems almost superfluous to mention the Bible in this connection as a good book to read, yet some who read only good books, fail to realize that their reading will fall short of the results they crave if they omit the one good book. Shakespeare is good, Dickens is good, Ruskin, Thackeray, Green, Longfellow, Holmes, Eliot, and a host of writers.

Poultry Authority Makes Prediction

It is my opinion that this is going to be the largest year that poultry raisers have had. I predict that eggs are going to retail for $1.00 a dozen this winter. I base this prediction on the fact that right now eggs are selling at 65c and 75c in some of the large cities.

E. J. REEFER
America's Poultry Expert

This means $1.00 a dozen for eggs by the first of the year, if previous seasons can be taken as a basis of calculation.

The poultry raiser, amateur and professional, who gives his poultry business his serious attention, this winter, and who spends a little money on the upkeep of his hens, is going to cash in, in a way never before dreamed of.

As America's foremost poultry expert, the foregoing are my serious convictions.

E J Reefer

Gets 45 Eggs a Day Instead of 2 or 3

"Increase to 45 Eggs a Day"

Since I began the use of your "More Eggs" Tonic, two weeks ago, I am getting 45 eggs a day, and before I was only getting 2 or 3 a day.
Dora Phillips, Derby, Iowa.

"Finishes Moult—Lays Quick"

Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic did my old hens good, for as they got through moulting they began laying. E. G. McCall, Williamsburg, Pa.

"Doubled Eggs in Canada"

I am very much pleased with your "More Eggs" Tonic, as my hens have more than doubled their eggs. Mrs. Andrew Falk, Vanarsdol, B.C., Can.

"Gets Winter Eggs"

It is the first time I got so many eggs in winter. When I began using "More Eggs" I was only getting from 1 to 3 eggs per day and now I am getting 11 to 13 eggs per day.
Mrs. Julia Gooden, Wilburton, Kan.

"Plenty of Eggs Now"

I have been using Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic for three weeks. When I started our hens were only averaging us 1 egg a day out of 100 hens, and we are getting plenty of eggs now.
T. E. Tate, Armorel, Ark.

"Astonished the Neighbors"

Am well pleased with results of "More Eggs." As I took my eggs in to the store today, people asked where did I get all those eggs.
H. J. Westfall, Lenora, Kan.

"Tripled Egg Production"

About one month ago I ordered 1 package "More Eggs" Tonic. I have been giving it to my hens and they have tripled my egg production.

I am sending you a postcard photo that I made on January 13, 1918. Those two full buckets, as you see, of eggs were gathered from a flock of 25 hens in ten days. O. F. Murphy, Glen Rose, Tex.

" 'More Eggs' Makes $300"

I used "More Eggs" Tonic during the winter. I was able to sell $300 worth of eggs in 1917. Good record. Josephine Bevard, Derby, Iowa.

"Selling Eggs Now"

I was not getting an egg when I began the use of the "More Eggs" Tonic. Now I am selling eggs. Mrs. J. F. Brink, Hebo, Ore.

"Hens Were Transformed"

I never saw such a transformation as in my hens since giving them "More Eggs". They have recovered from the disease and are laying straight on every day. Mrs. T. T. Banks, 109 Rowan St., Fayetteville, N. C.

" 'More Eggs' is Wonderful"

Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic is wonderful. Before we used it, we were only getting one egg a day; after using it three weeks we got 12 eggs per day. Howard D. Marrow, Gibsonia, Pa.

"From No Eggs to 37 Eggs a Day"

That "More Eggs" Tonic I got awhile back is just simply grand, the best thing I have ever used. When I started using it they did not lay at all. Now I get 37 eggs a day.
Edgar A. J. Linniger, Elwood, Ind.

"Started Hens Laying in 2 Weeks"

Your Egg Tonic has started my hens to work, and I haven't used it two weeks yet.
Mrs. W. Hunter, Aubrey, Ark.

"Increase from 8 to 36 Eggs"

I am well pleased with your "More Eggs" Tonic. I was only getting 8 or 9 eggs a day; now I am getting 3 dozen a day.
Wm. Schmidt, Shady Bend, Kan.

" 'More Eggs' Did the Work"

"More Eggs" Tonic did the work. I was only getting one or two eggs per day and some days none, and now we are getting nine to twelve per day. E. H. Carwile, Chanute, Kan.

"Sister Bartholomen Praises It"

I tried your "More Eggs" Tonic last year and certainly had success. With heartiest greetings, Sister Bartholomen, Villa Ridge, Mo.

" 'More Eggs' Vitally Necessary"

We find Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic of very great importance when desiring "More Eggs" from our flock. W. O. Smith, Oxford, Mich.

"Getting Lots of Eggs"

I am very well pleased with Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic and I am getting lots of eggs.
O. Dervuen, Jr., Bell City, Iowa.

"More Eggs Now Than for Two Years"

We received the other order of "More Eggs" Tonic and have used it as to directions. I am getting more eggs now than I have for the past two years. J. R. P. Munroe, Gallipolis, O.

"Doubles Egg Production"

I have been using "More Eggs" Tonic 3 or 4 weeks and must say it is fine. My egg production has been doubled.
J. C. Koeninger, Paradise, Tex.

"Wants to Introduce It"

"More Eggs" Tonic is the best thing I ever used, and I want to introduce it to my friends and neighbors. Wm. Greenbalgh, Absecon, N. J.

Eggs Paid the Pastor

I am so thankful to you, Mr. Reefer, that I can't express in words how much I have been benefited by your "More Eggs." As to eggs, I've got more eggs than I ever did, and am highly pleased with everything that I bought. My friends are now waking up when I tell them that "More Eggs" is the remedy for me. I've paid my debts, clothed the children in new dresses, and even bought John a new shirt—and that is not all—I paid my Pastor his dues, and have money to help those who have never heard the old story of "Jesus and His Love," and as I write this beautiful morning, the cackling of the hens are praising "God from Whom all blessings flow." I can safely say your Roup Remedy is all O. K. I sold 42½ dozen eggs last week, set 4 dozen, ate some and had 1½ dozen left. From your friend, Mrs. Lena McBroon, Woodbury, Tenn.

EGGS $1.00 A DOZE

Demand Greatest in Histo Eggs and Poultry to Stay At Top Notch Price

Higher Now Than Any Tim Since the Civil War—All Poultry Raisers to Profit

At no time in the history of the countr since the Civil War have eggs and poultr been in such demand. It is reported by a the large cities that the cold storage suppl has been just about exhausted by the enormous demand made by the Europea powers. It is estimated that a millio cases of eggs have been exported since th first of September and unless dealers in col storage can get immediate new supplies, i is predicted that eggs will bring a dollar dozen by January, and that fattened poultry will bring from 30 to 40c a pound killed Right now, fresh eggs are selling at 65c dozen in such cities as Philadelphia, Baltimore and New York, and it is predicted they will sell for $1.00 by the first of the year.

These top notch prices have excited great deal of activity, not alone in the markets, but among the small poultry raisers and among the farmers' wives, whc raise fowls. One man who raises poultry on a large scale has contracted to supply a New York hotel with guaranteed fresh eggs from now till Feb. 1, at 60c a dozen and fattened fowls at 35c a pound dressed. He says these prices will be obtained very easily and that the ordinary poultry raiser could double and treble his profits, if he would keep his fowls toned up with a good laying tonic and keep roup out of the flock. These are two simple precautions and with the present outlook anyone who neglects these things is simply robbing himself of just so many dollars per week.

It is also stated on authority that cold storage dealers as well as all large buyers are now demanding fowls that are in perfect condition on account of the huge export trade in these stocks and when they are barreled and sent abroad they have to be in prime health and those eggs also are in heavy demand which are being sold on a guarantee of being absolutely fresh. This is going to be a great year for the poultry raiser, both large and small, and various sources already report more scientific care and study of fowls, due to the above mentioned rigid demand and the enormous call at big prices for perfectly fresh eggs and fattened fowls. With the advent of cold weather, there will be a loud call for eggs at fancy prices.

Keeping the hens toned up and in good laying condition is going to pay the poultry raiser better this winter than ever before.

160 Hens—1500 Eggs

Mrs. H. M. Patton, Waverly, Mo., writes, "I fed 2 boxes of 'More Eggs' to my hens and broke the egg record. I got 1,500 eggs from 160 hens in exactly 21 days." You can do as well. In fact, any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs," and you will be amazed and delighted with results. "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, send one dollar to E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 2491 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., for a full sized package of "More Eggs" or send $2.25 on special discount for 3 regular one dollar packages—a full season's supply. Remember a million dollar bank guarantees to return your money if you are not perfectly satisfied. You run no risk—send for your "More Eggs" today or ask Mr. Reefer for his valuable poultry book free that tells the methods of a man that has shown thousands how to make money out of poultry.

Europe Awaits the "League of Nations"

On the Eve of the Peace Congress, President Wilson Confident of a Successful Outcome

EUROPE is undergoing a new experience. With infinite labor and untiring energy, the statesmen of the Allies devoted the first weeks of the New Year to preparing the way or the opening of the World's Peace Congress. t soon proved that the time was shorter than should ave been allowed for such a gigantic undertaking—he first of its kind in history. Three weeks ago, he machinery which was to be operated for the future maintenance of peace and justice in the world was on-existent; today it is practically complete, in erfect order and ready for work.

While President Wilson was testing public opinion n France, Great Britain and Italy, and delivering ddresses which wonderfully aided in enlightening he people of these countries as to the imperative need of a League of Nations, all of the Allied governments completed the choice of their delegates to the Congress. Among them are many of the leading statesmen in the Entente countries—men of the argest experience in international affairs. It need hardly be said that in most cases the Allied premiers head their respective delegations: Premier Lloyd George for Great Britain, Premier Orlando for Italy, Premier Clemenceau for France; and Baron Makino for Japan. President Wilson also for this occasion will sit in the capacity of Premier, rather than as a National Executive. Associated with them in the delegations are men of the highest ability, who have already devoted much time and effort to clearing the way for the settlement of international disputes, and all of whom have had, in these three weeks, opportunities to exchange views.

In these preliminary conferences, President Wilson, after his return from Italy, took an active part. Foreign Minister Stephen Pichon, of France, M. Leon Bourgeois, another member with ripe cabinet experience, Premier Orlando of Italy and a representative of Japan, held an informal conference at which preliminary points were discussed and details of procedure arranged. Lloyd George was not at this conference, being detained in England by the demobilization situation; this was one of the last meetings of the chiefs of the Allied governments before the opening of the Interallied Conference sessions. It is understood that a plan of work was outlined, practically forming a broad program to be used as a working basis in the Conference itself.

Stated briefly, this is indicated as the program for the Conference, as arranged at the preliminary meetings:

1. A general agreement between the United States and the Allied powers for the creation of a League of Nations or its equivalent, to decide the terms of peace and to guarantee and preserve the world's peace for the future.
2. Defining and establishing new independent states growing out of the war.
3. Assessing damages and indemnities and providing the manner of their payment.
4. Concluding treaties of peace with the Central Powers. It is probable that these peace treaties may not be taken up at an early stage of the Versailles Congress, in order that the Central Powers may have time to establish governments which can satisfy the Peace Congress of their stability and their intentions to observe and carry out the conditions of the treaties to be made. It is quite obvious that, under present conditions, neither Germany nor Austria can give the assurance needed.

There are, of course, many other problems arising out of the war, which will come up in due course and on which the Conference may take action, but these cannot be considered until the leading problems have been adjusted. Opportunity may arise which would justify the Conference and the united nations it represents, in rendering assistance in the formation of orderly and stable governments in Germany and elsewhere; but the form which such aid would take cannot be foreseen.

The various delegations will endeavor in this Conference to coordinate their views and form a program for the main body, the Peace Congress. Just when the Peace Congress will meet depends upon the progress made by the Interallied Conference in harmonizing the views of the Allies sufficiently for presentation to the Congress, so that the latter body may not assemble until the ground has been fully prepared and the work is ready.

WITH regard to the extent of the participation of the United States in the work of the Peace Congress, it is regarded as practically certain that that participation will go no further than to aid in securing the general adherence of the Congress and the powers there represented, to the principles already laid down by President Wilson. That there will be a limit beyond which America will not go can readily be understood.

It is not merely in deference to America's cooperation that the Congress will take up the organization of the League of Nations at an early stage of the proceedings. The truth is that the peoples of the continental nations, as far as they have been reached, strongly favor the League proposition. Many leading men among the Allies believe that the organization of the League would have a most salutary and pacifying effect both in Europe and the Near East. Indeed, British statesmen go so far as to say that the League, once founded and its work begun, will be a practical, business-like body, carrying on permanently the entire task of dealing with the nations in a business-like way, having all the necessary functions and administrative powers to enforce its decisions—in a word, will be the permanent trustee of world-peace. They believe it should have a strong and vigilant executive, courts of law and arbitration for dealing quickly with such questions as may arise within their scope, and a conference at which the enlargement of and changes in international law can be discussed and decided.

There are many hopeful signs pointing to the success of the League of Nations project. On the British side, this has gone so far that a special commission of British delegates has been created for the furtherance of the League plan, at the head of which is Lord Robert Cecil, himself an ardent advocate of the League. The precise attitude of the French statesmen has not been clearly defined, but they are feeling their way, and the same can be said of those of Italy. An explicit statement will be laid before the Peace Congress by President Wilson himself. He has talked with the representatives of all the Allied governments and all are looking to him to set forth, in his own lucid and convincing fashion, the attitude and desire of America on this subject. To use his own familiar phrase, he has "compared minds" with all the leaders, and having heard their views and fully considered the question in all its aspects, he will at the proper time lay before the Congress a proposition comprehensible to all.

One of the hardest men to get in line with the new idea is Premier Clemenceau. He has been a strong believer in the traditional "balance of power," and is disposed to regard the League as a proposition, the value of which can only be demonstrated by a practical trial. Italy's viewpoint is somewhat similar, as represented by the Premier and Sr. Sonnino.

One of the meetings of the representatives of the various governments, on the Sunday preceding the assembling of the Conference, had under discussion a program worked out by the French government. This was in the nature of a protocol, proposing exact lines of procedure for the Congress. The American delegates had the privilege of studying it and they noted that several of their suggestions had taken form in the French program. It deals with organization, representation of great and small powers, and general order of business. Before it can be submitted for adoption, it will have to be approved by President Wilson and the premiers of France, Britain and Italy, forming an executive body, which later will become a Supreme Council of the Powers, when the Congress is fully organized.

HOW the question of big navies and armaments may be dealt with is thus far a matter of conjecture. There are still other problems in the background which will doubtless be dealt with by committees of the Congress and duly brought before the main body; but all of these will come up at the proper time in their order. At the outset, the League itself is the overshadowing subject. President Wilson hears much but says little; the time for full expression is at hand, however, and any day may bring the event which Lord Robert Cecil has declared to be "indispensable as a first step toward future peace and a satisfactory settlement of international problems arising out of the war. It is our business," he adds, with emphasis, "to give League of Nations definite form here and n It would be a dangerous policy to let the Pe Congress drift along aimlessly without reachin positive organization of the League. This is, in opinion, probably the most difficult problem Peace Congress has to face."

President Wilson, although feeling somewhat physical effects of his continued labors, has k indefatigably busy, clearing the way for the gr task that brought him to Europe. He keeps close touch with the members of the American Pe Delegation, and is evidently satisfied with t situation. Colonel House and Secretary Lansing with him more or less every day in consultati He has had extended talks with many Alli leaders, including Premier Clemenceau and Lo Robert Cecil. His consultations have been, the main, satisfactory. The President now go into the final battle with the fullest confiden being satisfied that on all the main points, wh there may be considerable discussion, the resu cannot fail to be satisfactory.

The first informal meeting of the Allied Conferen was held at the French Foreign Office in Paris January 12. It was attended by President Wilson a Secretary Lansing, Premier Clemenceau of Fran who presided, Premier Lloyd George of England a Mr. Arthur J. Balfour, Premier Orlando of Italy a Foreign Minister Sonnino, Stephen Pichon, Fren Foreign Minister, and Marshal Foch. The conferen was opened promptly at 3 o'clock and it was announc that the meeting was held mainly for the purpose setting new terms for prolonging the armistice, whi expired January 17, and to determine the number a composition of the delegations of the various countri to the Peace Congress.

Premier Clemenceau was quoted on January 11, declaring that the subject of a League of Nations mu be the first one taken up by the conference.

Berlin Torn by Civil War

Karl Liebknecht, leader of Spartacides

THE German Bolsheviki or Spartacides under Karl Liebknecht, finding themselves in the minority in every gathering of representatives of the German people, started out on January 6 to seize the power in Berlin by force of arms. At 6.30 o'clock on the evening of January 6, fighting broke out in the streets of Berlin. Both sides used machine guns, and the troops supporting the Ebert Government used field guns as well. It was reported that many hundreds of people were injured and 200 were killed. The immediate cause of the trouble was the attempt of Chancellor Ebert to depose Herr Eichhorn as Chief of Police, Eichhorn being the sole respresentative of the Reds in office in the German capital. The Spartacides seized all the newspaper offices in Berlin, the banks, the wireless telegraph office, the railway offices and the headquarters of Reuter's News Agency. Processions numbering thousands of demonstrators marched through the streets of Berlin prior to the opening of hostilities, women and children joining in. Meanwhile, with Berlin in turmoil, the rest of the 70,000,000 people of the German Empire were preparing for the elections to be held on January 19 for delegates of the National Assembly in which Germany's future government will take form. The various old parties were all in the running, but the advantage seemed to lie with the majority Socialists, whose strength is now behind the present government.

All through January 7 and 8 Berlin was seething with unrest as procession after procession passed up and down the famous avenues of the once imperial capital shouting "Nieder, Nieder" for those they were against and "Hoch, Hoch" for those t ey favored. The open spaces filled with people, among whom the orators of the Spartacides circulated daringly, although they apparently persuaded few to follow them. The People's Commissioners were defending the Chancellor's palace, while the Spartacides were making their headquarters in the Royal palace and stables. A proposition for a parley from the Spartacides was refused by the Ebert Government until such time as the rebels should evacuate public buildings in their possession. General fighting was avoided, however, although both sides were busily arming their partisans, and there were occasional clashes with sanguinary results.

The Ebert Government declared its intention to defend itself against the "insane policy and rascally behavior of the Spartacides." Philip Scheidemann declared that if the Spartacides won, the women and children of Germany would be abandoned to worse famine than during the four terrible years of war. He appealed to the former soldiers to defend the Government.

On January 9 Karl Liebknecht, in association with Ledebour and Scholtz, formed a new government and established headquarters in the Central Police Station. The Spartacus fever was reported to be spreading in Germany and reports from Dusseldorf and Munich told of three persons being killed in the former and two in the latter place, while at Schwerin, public buildings seized by the Bolshevists were later retaken by loyal troops. In establishing his new government, Liebknecht called upon the workers to go on strike until the Ebert and Scheidemann government should fall, declaring that the Socialist revolution had begun at last, and crying out, "Long live the world revolution and international socialism." Scheidemann replied that "this mess must end. We will not allow the minority to terrorize the majority any longer. The government will suppress the Spartacus movement with arms." Chancellor Ebert in a manifesto stated that Liebknecht had declared war to the knife against the non-Socialist population and appealed to all loyal persons to form a voluntary republican defense guard.

The Premier of Bavaria, on January 7, declared that Berlin was not Germany and, that if disorde there did not cease, Bavaria would intervene wit arms.

Late on January 8 the Ebert forces, reinforced b thousands of loyal troops from outside Berlin, bega a campaign to clear the Spartacides from their strong holds. Machine guns proving of little avail agains the sides of the buildings in which the Reds wer fortified, field guns were brought into play and th populace scurried from the streets to avoid the cros fire of the contending factions. The battle for Berli continued into the ninth and late reports indicate that the government had triumphed and that th Spartacides had been driven from most of their posi tions and the city restored to the control of the con stituted authorities. Earlier in the day there wer rumors that Ebert had been overthrown and als that Liebknecht had been killed.

On January 10 the Spartacides had been practically driven from the streets but were still holding the police headquarters and the newspaper offices. The area under their control was steadily lessening, although their control of railways threatened the food supply. Following the loss by the Spartacides of the Foreign office it was rumored that Herr Eichhorn had fled.

In some quarters the opinion was expressed that the German disorders were not genuine revolution but an attempt to impress the Entente with the necessity for easier terms.

“HOSANNA! HOSANNA!”

THE WONDERFUL STORY OF JERUSALEM’S DELIVERANCE ON THE EVE OF THE “FEAST OF LIGHTS”

THIS thrilling narrative by Madam Ben Yehudah, an eye-witness and participant, is taken from her article in the book entitled “Jerusalem, Its Redemption and Future,” now in press. It is published by the Christian Herald. The volume is the first authentic presentation of experiences of the Holy City and its people during the iod from the time they were shut in from the world l General Allenby’s forces brought relief and comted capitulation by the Turks.

FOR three years the Holy City had suffered privations and sorrows. It was as if the plague had raged within the walls. Most of the houses were closed because the inhabitants re dead or deported, exiled or in prison. Deserted re the streets. One dreaded to be seen outdoors fear of falling victim to the rage of the Turks.

People hid themselves in cellars and subterranean ssages, where life continued underground by the ht of olive oil lamps.

The musicians composed music, the poets com- sed verses, the professors meditated upon the pupils om they hoped to receive in the coming hour of iverance.

The women kept house underground; but there was tle food to prepare. They had forgotten the appear- ce of a loaf of bread. The babies died for lack of lk

Even in these hiding places, one heard the roar of rkish cannon, which was directed against the Nebi Samuel” (the Tomb of Samuel), where the nglish had fortified themselves. One passionate sire filled the hearts of Jews and Christians alike as ey waited for the hour of deliverance. Their confi- nce in the victorious strength of the English failed t. The devout souls were uplifted in ardent prayer. ous vows were pronounced. They prayed that the rd God would deliver them by a miracle, and show s hand as in former days.

BUT now it seemed as if the arm of the Lord was turned against the Jews and deliverance seemed r off. Their fervent prayers were rudely interrupted the intrusion of Turkish soldiers. The gendarmerie tered and penetrated down to the cellars and rested the defenseless Hebrews. They tore the sbands from the arms of their wives, and separated e children from their parents. They beat their isoners and loaded them with chains and drove em outdoors into the mud and rain. The storm shed the helpless prisoners as they were driven rth without coats and without bread. The soldiers aded them forward like cattle to the assembly aces where those who were to be deported were thered together. The wives and the young women rew themselves upon the necks of their husbands d fathers and brothers, insisting that they should are the horrors of this terrible forced journey. The ctims were taken away in the direction of Jericho.

During the execution of this cruel edict of deporta- on in Jerusalem, news arrived of a dreadful deed rpetrated in Pethah Tikivah. Djemal Pasha had arrived and passed through this colony from one end to another. Then he shut himself in his rooms, without saying a word to anyone, and after an hour’s silence he departed.

The colonists were filled with foreboding. They said: “Some great evil awaits us!” On the following day, Djemal Pasha sent a dark emissary, noted for his cruelty, with the command that “the guardians of the colony should be surrendered to him.” (The guardians of the Jewish colonies were always the finest young men, who filled the office of watchmen, forming a sort of voluntary police. As “watchmen” they were under vows to sacrifice their lives for their people.) The inhabitants of Pethah Tikivah gathered together and resolved that they would rather all perish than to deliver up their guardians to death.

THEN three Jewish Austrian workingmen arose in the assembly and one, being the speaker, said: “To save the guardians and the colony, we propose that you name us as guardians and fear not for us, because, since we are Austrian, the Turks will not dare to vent their ferocity upon us subjects of the Central Powers. The worst they will do will be to imprison us; and we will wait patiently, with hundreds of our companions, for the day of deliverance.”

But no sooner did the Turks have these three brave Austrians in their power than they accused them of high treason. In order to force them to make confession and to name accomplices, the bastinado was inflicted upon them.

They were also beaten with muskets and kicked, and lifted up bodily to a great height and then violently cast down. After they were rendered unconscious by these atrocities, they were dragged off and cast into prison in Damascus, where they died. No form of trial was given to these innocent men. The emissary and his soldiers acted as accuser and judges and executioners.

Other Austrians in Jerusalem were also maltreated and deported.

Then the vials of wrath were poured upon the American Jews also. They were arrested on the streets and in the houses and beaten and dragged away and forced to march on foot, exposed to mud and rain, all the way to Damascus. Those who were sick were carried on litters. One American, discovered concealed in a cellar, was sent laden with chains to Damascus.

IN THE meanwhile the Turkish cannon was destroying the Tomb of Samuel, and the English were making a movement whose object was to encircle Jerusalem. The Turks and Germans commanded that the city should be defended and they sent for reinforcements from Damascus. The garrison was not sufficiently strong in numbers or in morale to sustain the attack without aid. When the reinforcements failed to arrive, the Turks perceived that they would be obliged to evacuate.

In great haste, they arrested every one whom they caught on the streets, including the Dutch consul, and a distinguished Austrian physician, a member of the Board of Health.

Djemal Pasha had already left for Damascus. Soon after, an edict was issued commanding the deportation of all the Christian and all the Jewish inhabitants of Jerusalem.

The governor did the favor to the Dutch consul and two other distinguished prisoners to allow them a respite of three days in which to prepare for their journey. The Turkish authorities were themselves embarrassed as to the means of executing this last great act of deportation which included the great mass of the population of Jerusalem. It was expected that the Germans would be of assistance in enforcing the edict, but the Germans were occupied in saving themselves. After the flights, the exiles, the deportations, executions and imprisonments, it was estimated that over 30,000 Jews and Christians still remained.

Refugees at a relief kitchen in Jerusalem

IN VAIN the Jews implored Zaki Bey to save them. He replied that nothing could save them! They must prepare for the deportation. Then a bitter suspicion entered the hearts of the Jews. They suspected that even their friend, Zaki Bey himself, was an accomplice of the Turks. It was observed that all of the families with whom Zaki Bey was chiefly associated, were the special objects of persecution. The Jews surmised that he had abused their confidence and betrayed them.

In these terrible days in Jerusalem, Jews and Christians fasted and prayed. Their common sorrow and desolation drew them nearer to one another. They sought concealment in the darkest cellars and deepest subterranean passages. Jews and Christians found refuge together.

It was in this darkness and dread that the Jews awaited the coming of their great festival of light and gladness, Hannucca, the Feast of Deliverance in former days, and now approaching as the day of destruction! The women, weeping, prepared the oil for the sacred lights, and even the men wept, saying that this would be the last time they should keep the feast in Jerusalem! They strained their ears to hear the horses’ hoofs and the tread of the soldiers coming to arrest them and drive them forth. The women pressed their children to their breasts crying: “They are coming to take us!—the persecutors, the assassins!”

Then, suddenly, other women came rushing from outside down into the depths, crying:

“Hosanna! Hosanna! The English!—the English have arrived!”

WEEPING and shouting for joy, Jews and Christians, trembling and stumbling over one another, emerged and rushed forth from the caverns and holes and underground passages.

With loud cries, with outstretched hands, they blessed the company of their deliverers, who advanced in a glory of light, for all Jerusalem was illuminated by the crimson light of the setting sun!

The Harbor Strike in New York

Port of New York Closed by Strike

FOLLOWING the announcement by the War Labor Board at New York that the attitude of the private boat owners and the railroad administration made it impossible for the Board to proceed to consider the situation created by demands of the Marine Workers Union, the Union on January 9 called out all masters, pilots, mates and engineers on all the Harbor Craft around New York City. Every line of ferry boats was stopped and all transatlantic commerce was made impossible as there were no tugs to put the steamers into their berths. The city of New York which was already suffering from a shortage of milk due to a strike of the Dairymen's League against a combination of distributors was threatened with a complete exhaustion of its food stuffs. 15,000 men were concerned in the strike which was inaugurated to force an 8-hour day and a 20% increase in wages.

The strike continued through January 9 and 10, over a thousand boats being tied up, and 200,000 commuters from New Jersey being more or less retarded in their daily travels to and from New York. Over 20,000 people in Staten Island were practically immured for a whole day. On January 9 the police began operating one ferry boat on the Staten Island line and a few railway ferries were placed in operation. In this situation the McAdoo tubes proved not only the wisdom of their construction but the extent of their capacity. Secretary of Labor Wilson sent a cablegram to President Wilson asking him to take action to bring about a settlement of the Harbor situation in New York.

All attempts to compose the differences of the two contending organizations had failed up to the morning of January 11. The Railway Administration offered to enter into a truce with the strikers during which their multiplied services could be operated pending a decision of the Arbitration Board, but the strikers refused anything short of a complete settlement involving all parties. The towboat owners also attempted to establish a conciliation committee to be composed of 10 representatives of each side, but the strikers would have none of it. In the meantime the harbor was filling up with boats from every point, and transports were being docked with difficulty, but with rare skill by navy tugs, a single tug in one instance handling a 15,000-ton ship ordinarily handled by from 4 to 6. The facilities of the railroads running into New York City were concentrated on food and fuel, resulting in an embargo on all other merchandise.

On January 11, a message was received by the War Labor Board from President Wilson in which he expressed the earnest hope that the board, "in the present period of industrial transition" would "use all the means within its power to stabilize conditions and to prevent industrial dislocation and warfare," and asked the board to resume its activities in the case. Former President Taft and Basil M. Manly, chairmen of the board, at once arranged to begin hearings in New York on January 13, and the unions called the strike off. Slight improvement in harbor service had been achieved during the eleventh, while the navy had succeeded in finding 250 men among its enlisted personnel who had had experience on harbor craft, and was preparing to use them to take care of transports and transatlantic craft in the service of the army and navy.

TROTZKY DICTATOR IN RUSSIA. Copenhagen dispatches of January 8 declared that Nikolai Lenine, Bolshevist Premier of Russia, had been arrested and imprisoned in the Kremlin at Moscow at the command of Leon Trotzky, Minister of War, who had made himself dictator. Trotzky was reported to have taken this action because Lenine wished to effect a coalition with the moderaters and end the reign of Red terror in Russia. Lenine and Trotzky seized the power in Russia on November 7, 1917. While seizing power at Petrograd Trotzky was also sending his army against Vilna, while in Riga the Soviet was arresting all the members of the bourgeoisie. Polish troops were ready to defend Vilna. The Poles were also fighting against Ruthenians for the possession of Lemberg. Warsaw dispatches of January 8 reported Vilna captured by the Bolshevist army, which had begun a massacre of civilians. Polish troops who were without artillery had been disarmed by the Germans and sent back toward Polish territory.

RED TERROR IN ARGENTINA. A strike in the great steel works at Buenos Ayres, instigated by Russian agitators, on January 9, was followed on Jan 10 by the calling of a general st and by the declaration of a mili dictatorship, under Gen. Dellepain command of the military forces of Argentine capital. A number of cla at arms occurred. All railways Argentina were stopped and gov ment forces patrolled the streets of capital, whose business was at a st still. On January 10 General D paine was reported to have demande each side in the controversy a comp statement of its demands, and on eleventh it was announced that strike was over. The condition of a chy was then slowly yielding to government forces, although ince arism and mob violence were not wh checked. The Russian agitators w arrested and placed aboard ship in harbor for deportation. On Janu 12 four Russian agitators were arres in Montevideo and the police w searching for 42 more. The lea declared that he and his associa had come to the Argentine and Urug to establish Soviet governments.

The Church and the Soldier "after the War"

I HAVE been greatly interested in reading the discussion in the Christian Herald of the question of "The Church after the War." I think all that has been said by the various eminent writers has much merit in it, and is worthy of the most serious consideration.

I would like, however, to have the privilege of adding a word or two, as one who, over here in France, has been with the troops in training areas and on battlefronts, and who has had, therefore, an opportunity of knowing, to some degree at least, the mind of the soldier, and what he might expect of the Church when he gets home and what would be the best policy for the Church to pursue in regard to the boys "when they re marching home."

n my work among the soldiers at the front, I have er seen any need of poking religion into a corner f being ashamed of the Gospel of Christ. I have nd a ready disposition on the part of the soldier s to respond to a vital and manly Gospel effort; let it be remembered, we never paid any attention denominational or sectarian lines. For instance: the Sunday (July 14) of the Battle of the Marne, battalion with which I was associated held a posi- on a high hill overlooking the river Marne, be- en St. Eugene and Crezancy. We all felt that ething tremendous was pending, and that the mans were liable to break in on us at any time n their offensive. Our commanding officer issued ers for religious service at 7 P. M. The service was nded by Protestants, Catholics and Jews. I used e of the Episcopal form for evening service, read "Gloria" and a prayer for peace from a Catholic y ritual, and read my lesson and preached from Old Testament. At its close a Catholic corporal e over to thank me for the service and told me much he enjoyed it. That was the last religious ice many of those boys attended—that night at night the Germans turned what seemed a thousand heir heavy guns on us in a bombardment that ed for ten hours.

Down in the valley, the chaplain (a Presbyterian) d a service the same day in a big barn. He preached Gospel message, and at its close invited all who uld consecrate themselves to Christ to indicate y a show of hands. A number of men took the . During the bombardment, two of the boys were dled together in a trench, and one of them said to fellow, as the shrieking, deadly shells flew over ir heads: "I am glad I consecrated myself to Christ he meeting today." That night one of those boys s killed.

FTER the Battle of the Marne, and when we had hiked to another point of attack, we were gath- d around one of the kitchens, when conversation s started on religious matters. One man, a Hebrew, l a sergeant, said:

"Well, I know we have all prayed more to God in last few weeks than we ever did in our lives before."

Another spoke up: "Yes, fellows have prayed who ve never prayed before."

After our troops had been on two battlefronts and re sent back for a rest of three weeks, it was my lot join with a good United Presbyterian of Pittsburg, . J. R. Simpson, in working in a Y. M. C. A. hut in "Joan of Arc" country. Our hut had formerly n a hospital, so it proved to be delightfully roomy l adapted to all kinds of activities. We both of us olved to try out a religious program on the Sundays. took good care that during the week the men uld have abundance of recreation, entertainments, . Baseball was played every afternoon, and every ht in the hut something was going on. We cut out nday baseball, and put up a strong religious program, follows: 10 A. M., preaching; 2 P. M., Bible school; . M., evangelistic service. On both Sunday nights preached an old-fashioned Gospel message to an dience of men that crowded the hut full. On the t Sunday night, fourteen men decided for Christ, next Sunday, twenty, and on the following Sunday ht, in a communion service held in another town, in an old French schoolhouse—which was packed with men—we administered baptism to twelve and communion to 100 men.

Chaplain George W. Ridout just as he came out of the Argonne battle

Now, let it be remembered, these men had been in battle; they had seen their comrades die and many many more wounded and maimed. They themselves had come through, and they were thankful, and their hearts were tender toward things divine, their souls cried out for God, and the good old Gospel seemed to satisfy their needs.

A Sermon to Preachers

I AM greatly disappointed with some preachers of today,
With their logic and their ethics; their aristocratic way;
With their science and their theories and their new Theology,
Full of everything but Jesus and his love for you and me.
There is plenty in the Bible for the preachers of today,
If they will but search its pages and for help divine would pray;
For God's Word is everlasting and it never will grow old—
'Tis indeed a priceless treasure—far more precious e'en than gold.

What we want is consecration in a good true man of God,
With a Bible education, and a love for God's dear Word;
Who can lead us and direct us to the truth, the life, the way,
Which brings peace to soul and body through the burdens of the day.
If the preachers in our churches would preach Jesus crucified,
How through love for us He suffered, and through love for us, He died,
Then our pews would not be empty, as so many are today,
But be filled to overflowing, in a pentecostal way.

What we need is just plain Gospel, in the good old-fashioned way,
Place of Emerson or Shakespeare, or some topic of the day.
What care we for all their sayings, or their teachings true and tried?
We want just the dear old story of the Saviour crucified,
That alone can make men better, that alone can make men free—
Just the precious, dear old story, of God's love for you and me;
That is what the people's wanting, there is where the crowd will be;
Where they hear the same old story, which they heard at mother's knee.

LUETTA CUMMINS

ANOTHER thing which emphasized this was that on a Sunday evening, not far from another battlefront toward which we were fast moving, an open-air service was held, attended perhaps by a thousand men. The leader asked how many men had Testaments. All over the circle hands went up. He then asked the men to hold up their Testaments, that he might see them. Perhaps eighty per cent. of that group of men had each a Testament. I have frequently taken out of the pockets of soldier boys who had got killed the little Testaments, and many a time we have had demands upon us for Testaments that we could not supply. The boys seemed to feel that they ought not to go into battle without the Word of God.

THE Church after the War? Well, let me speak as one who has preached the Gospel twenty-five years at home and a year in the army in France; as one who has seen war in all its frightful actualities and who for five months lived and suffered and wrought under shell-fire, and who knows by a bit of real experience what officers and men have to go through and have come out of.

First. Let the Church present a live, vital Gospel. I mean the kind that is found in the New Testament. Don't let the pulpit spend its precious time on such secondary matters as "reconstruction," "expansion," the "new social conditions," etc. The press, the magazine, the forum, the lyceum, the lecture hall, etc., can better handle a lot of those questions than the average preacher. That was a good reply of Henry Ward Beecher, while lecturing at Yale, when he was asked if the preacher should devote some time to lecturing on various subjects other than religions. "What's the use," said Beecher, "of having two nozzles to your hose, when you have only water enough for one?" Exactly! I believe the Church and the pulpit that "after the war" build on the same old Gospel that Spurgeon and Talmage and Simpson and Moody preached will be the one that the soldier boys will want to go to, and that will best meet the new conditions brought upon us by the World War. Remember, it was after the Civil War that Moody's mighty work took place, and no man clung to the old, old Gospel like Moody. Remember also that the man to whom England is listening to today is John H. Jowett, whose message is always and only that of the New Testament Gospel.

Second. Let the churches drop all denominational rivalry; let all petty bickerings be cleaned out; let even theological hair-splitting be done away with, and let the Church settle down to the main proposition: that of promoting the interests of the Kingdom of God. Let there be a settling down to that business chiefly—all other things, all other questions, all other activities being secondary.

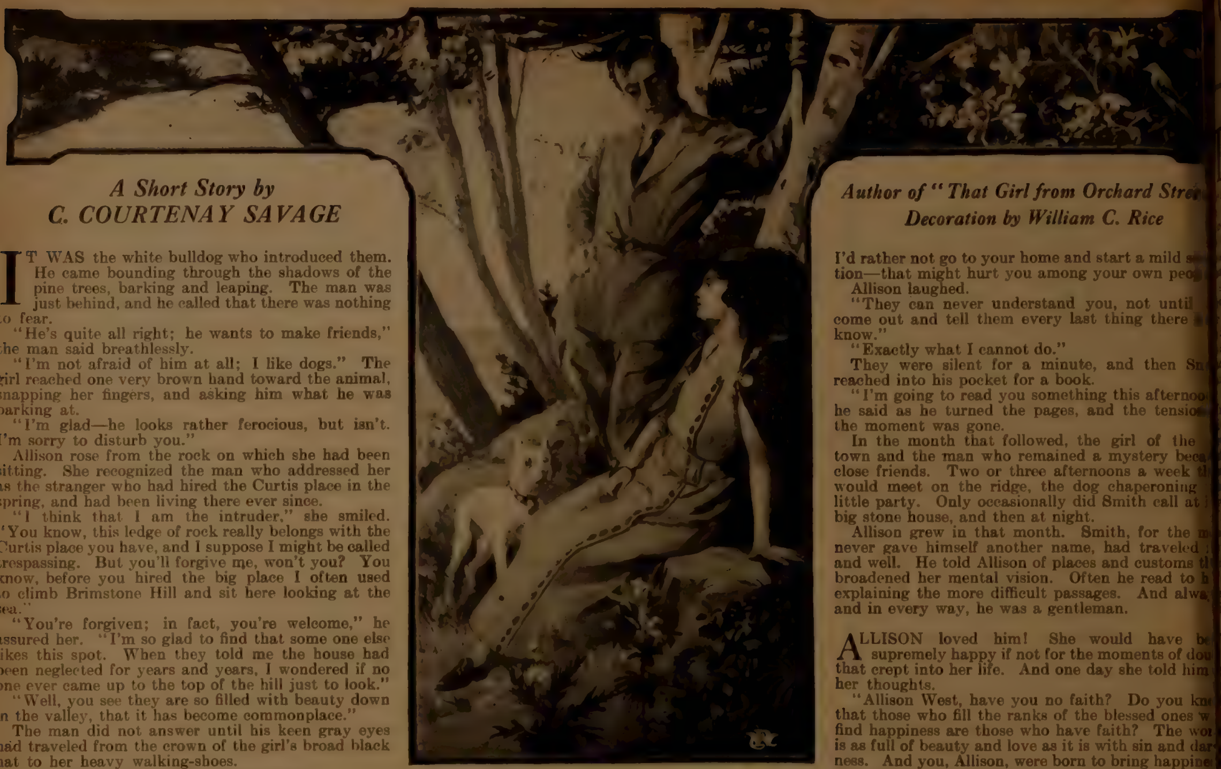
Third. Let the Church guard sacredly the things handed down to her, and let not war conditions and their cessation bring on a hysteria of liberality by which the golden law of Moses might be exchanged, for expediency's sake, for something brassy, and the "old faith" substituted by a program entirely human.

WAR has a tendency to produce a short memory for the Ten Commandments. Peace must needs improve that memory. The Church must apply herself to this important bit of business. The old Decalogue has had some rough usage the past year or more. America must look out here!

Then there has been a lot of wild talk about a new Gospel coming from the trenches and battlefields. Well, I have been through the thing, and have been associated with thousands who have been through the thing, and we have found no new Gospel in the trenches or dugouts or battlefields of France. Oh, no! We have seen blood there and demons. We have wrestled with the powers of darkness there, and have seen suffering men cry in their agonies to God. We have met all kinds of things in the trenches and dugouts and battlefield, but have failed to find any Gospel there better than the Gospel of our childhood, the Gospel of our youth, the Gospel of our manhood and ministry, which is the good old Gospel of the New Testament. And let it be remembered that the boys, as they march out of the trenches and battlefields on their way home, will carry with them the same New Testament that they bore upon the battlefront, because they have failed to find anything any better.

Let no one be deceived by a spurious cry of a new Gospel. And now that the war is over, just let the churches do what old Peter Cartwright, of early Methodist history, said when dying: "Give the old Gospel a chance."

THE MYSTERIOUS MR. SMITH



They were silent for a minute

A Short Story by
C. COURTENAY SAVAGE

Author of "That Girl from Orchard Stre
Decoration by William C. Rice

IT WAS the white bulldog who introduced them. He came bounding through the shadows of the pine trees, barking and leaping. The man was just behind, and he called that there was nothing to fear.

"He's quite all right; he wants to make friends," the man said breathlessly.

"I'm not afraid of him at all; I like dogs." The girl reached one very brown hand toward the animal, snapping her fingers, and asking him what he was barking at.

"I'm glad—he looks rather ferocious, but isn't. I'm sorry to disturb you."

Allison rose from the rock on which she had been sitting. She recognized the man who addressed her as the stranger who had hired the Curtis place in the spring, and had been living there ever since.

"I think that I am the intruder," she smiled. "You know, this ledge of rock really belongs with the Curtis place you have, and I suppose I might be called trespassing. But you'll forgive me, won't you? You know, before you hired the big place I often used to climb Brimstone Hill and sit here looking at the sea."

"You're forgiven; in fact, you're welcome," he assured her. "I'm so glad to find that some one else likes this spot. When they told me the house had been neglected for years and years, I wondered if no one ever came up to the top of the hill just to look."

"Well, you see they are so filled with beauty down in the valley, that it has become commonplace."

The man did not answer until his keen gray eyes had traveled from the crown of the girl's broad black hat to her heavy walking-shoes.

"Won't you sit down?" he asked quickly.

THE girl flushed. For the first time the man realized that she was more than pretty; she was alive with a vivid personality. Her eyes and hair were dark, her skin tanned by contact with the open air.

"I don't think I'd better; I'll leave you—to the view."

"But I'd like to talk with you! I've watched the dancing waves a hundred times, but never with any one else—that is, unless you count the dog."

She had almost forgotten the dog, but she saw that he had curled himself on a patch of moss that was in the direct path of a shaft of sunlight, and was watching them with half-closed eyes.

"But—but I really think I had better go." She was thinking what her neighbors would say if they knew of her meeting with the mysterious man of Brimstone Hill.

"And I can't persuade you at all? Please, Miss—" he stopped, waiting for her to fill in the name.

"West, Allison West," she said quickly.

"Please, Miss West."

For another minute she hesitated, and then went back to the rock where she had been sitting. The man found a place a few feet away from her.

"Now, just as punishment for having considered yourself a trespasser, I'm going to make you talk. First tell me about the village."

"There isn't much to tell. It's just the dreamiest place in the world. We've all been here for ages and ages. We've got the mill, some of the men own their own lumber schooners—and the town doesn't grow. Do you know," suddenly leaning forward, "you're the first real stranger to come here for years. I think you've caused more excitement here than the war."

"Then you do keep up with the day's news?"

"Yes; many of our boys have gone. Every one is doing his part, here, in Plum Harbor." There was a note of challenge in her tone. The man looked at her intently, his glance hard as flint.

"Tell me—and please tell me truthfully—why did you come here, and what are they saying about me—and about war—in the village?"

THE girl looked at him sharply.

"I came here because I love to look at the harbor from this ridge. In the village they're very much stirred up about war."

He nodded, waiting for the rest of the story.

"And about you—they've said so much, I don't know what to tell you first. The Curtis home was considered so fine, that when the last Curtis was gone the cousin who inherited the place couldn't live there. When you came, the house had been standing idle for ten years, ever since I was twelve years old. Can't you see what an impression it made on the people to have the place inhabited? Then the strife of Europe came nearer to us. The two excitements came so close that we seemed to feel that you were part of the greater thing that was going on outside our valley. You've been awfully queer to us. You don't get much mail, and you do get long telegrams, and we don't exactly trust that man who does the buying for you. Man servants don't seem right here. And all the while we've been wondering more and more just what you are: slacker from the city, spy, or what?"

"My man told me that the town people were curious, but I have no explanation to make."

The girl did not answer him. When he spoke again, it was of the colors of the sunset, and of the skies of many lands. The girl listened intently for many minutes.

"I can't wait for the rest of it," Allison interrupted. "It's almost supper time, and if I wasn't home promptly they might start hunting for me." She rose, and started off a few paces. The man, jumping to his feet, offered to walk as far as the road with her.

"No, thank you; it is better that I go alone. Good-night—and your name isn't really Smith, is it?"

The man smiled.

"No matter what my name, or my business, please believe me when I say that I am no coward, and not a spy. Good-night, Miss West."

THE next day the man servant from the big house on the hill left a note at the door of the West house. It was for Allison, and briefly asked if the writer might call on her. He had no friends in the small village and had so thoroughly enjoyed their meeting on the ridge. Allison talked with her cousin, who had lived with her since her parents' death had left her in possession of the big stone house and the prosperous farm lands, and sent word back that she would be glad to receive Mr. Smith.

He came in the twilight and stayed an hour. Cousin Lucy, who had lived in Boston before coming to Plum Harbor, found him delightful, a gentleman, a man of the world, though he gave no inkling of who or what he was. And when he left, he asked if he might call again.

After that they saw one another frequently, Smith calling at the house, but most of their meetings taking place on the ridge where they had first met.

"I feel rather like a cad allowing you to climb up here to see me," Smith apologized one afternoon; "but, frankly, they don't seem to like me in town. I'd rather not go to your home and start a mild s tion—that might hurt you among your own peo

Allison laughed.

"They can never understand you, not until come out and tell them every last thing there know."

"Exactly what I cannot do."

They were silent for a minute, and then Sn reached into his pocket for a book.

"I'm going to read you something this afternoo he said as he turned the pages, and the tensio the moment was gone.

In the month that followed, the girl of the town and the man who remained a mystery beca close friends. Two or three afternoons a week th would meet on the ridge, the dog chaperoning little party. Only occasionally did Smith call at big stone house, and then at night.

Allison grew in that month. Smith, for the m never gave himself another name, had traveled and well. He told Allison of places and customs th broadened her mental vision. Often he read to h explaining the more difficult passages. And alwa and in every way, he was a gentleman.

ALLISON loved him! She would have be supremely happy if not for the moments of dou that crept into her life. And one day she told him her thoughts.

"Allison West, have you no faith? Do you kn that those who fill the ranks of the blessed ones w find happiness are those who have faith? The wo is as full of beauty and love as it is with sin and dar ness. And you, Allison, were born to bring happine to make the world worth while. I know—I know wh you have come to mean to me. Some day—and th eternal some day will really come—I'll tell you wh you have meant to me, because here among doubte you have had faith in me. Don't question me now

As the summer ripened into early fall, the litt community was stirred to indignation over the viv newspaper reports of the spy exposé and the gover ment's steps towards internment. And one morni came the news of the death of Billy Adams. Adam was a town boy who had enlisted in the navy at th first news of war. Patrolling the waters of the barre zone, a submersible had crept up on the small nav craft, and Billy Adams found an eternal resting-pla in the great waters—Plum Harbor's first sacrifice the cause of freedom.

The people of the town were stunned, and, goi to the post-office for mail, Allison met men and wome with drawn faces. That afternoon the postmast was called to the telephone to receive a message fro Gilford, the nearest town on the railroad, twelve mil away. It was a telegram to be delivered to Smith, an apparently in code. The postmaster copied it ve carefully before he sent it up the hill, and the boy wh carried the paper spoke of its contents to several o the loungers who were constantly about the office.

"Kind of funny, him getting a message like tha I never did trust that fellow," one of the men remarked, and the seed of suspicion that had bee planted for so many weeks before sprang immediatel into ripened fruit.

Within an hour a hideously distorted story wa flying as flame before the wind, and the men an women of the village were planning together as to ho they might capture the spy. Some went as far as t remember seeing mysterious lights. Others believe that the code message was instructions sent from Berlin by a hidden wireless plant. It was a primitiv town, touched to the quick by the searing finger of war

ALLISON heard the news when it was almost sunset. The quickly made plan was that the spy was to be taken after dark, and resistance would mean death. The hired man brought the information when he came in with the evening's milking, and for a moment the girl was awed into questionless silence.

Smith a spy! There came to her mind his ringing declaration when he had given her his word that such was not the case. Suppose he had lied to her? For many, many minutes she sat pondering. What should she do? Was it a case of for or against her country Far down the street she heard a small boy playing a drum—even the children were filled with the spirit of war. War! She shuddered when she thought o

Christian Endeavor from Sea to Sea

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

IV

THE second Christian Endeavor Society was formed about nine months after the first—this one in the North Church of Newburyport, Mass. Then, stimulated by some arti- s I had been asked to write for the Congregationalist d the Sunday School Times on "How One Church res for Its Young People," other societies began to formed in churches of different denominations, and ters began to pour in upon me, asking for further ormation, and for copies of the constitution.

At first, of course, the growth was comparatively w, but, like a snowball rolling down a mountain, as e movement gathered momentum it grew enor- usly in size; one society formed anothe , one pastor ld another how his young people had been quickened d set at work, until soon hundreds and then thou- nds of new societies were formed every year.

It must not be thought that there was no opposition. e society easily escaped the woe of those of whom men speak well. Though the opposition was far s than that which met the Sunday school, it was yet fficient to stimulate the leaders to look well to funda- ental principles. This was not a difficult task, for e society had but two fundamental principles—yalty and fellowship. Loyalty to the Lord Jesus hrist and his Church, the particular church to which ch Endeavorer belonged, and fellowship with all ho loved and served the same Lord. It had no borate creed to defend, but simply the pledge, Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I omise him that I will strive to do whatever he would ke to have me do," and few could find fault with that.

THE most serious opposition came from certain ecclesiastical authorities who feared that the alle- ance of the young people to denominational causes ight be weakened because of their fellowship with hers. This resulted, after about eight or ten years, the formation of several purely denominational oung people's societies, into which many Endeavor cieties were changed and their fellowship withdrawn om the others. It looked for a time as though the essed unity of the earlier years would be shattered.

This, however, was not to be, for the total number Endeavor Societies constantly increased, and after few years most of the purely denominational socie- es came back into the Christian Endeavor ranks, so at now it embraces the young people of more than a undred evangelical denominations throughout the orld, and the emphasis is still, as it always has been, n fidelity and faithfulness to one's own church and enomination, which our interdenominational and orld-wide fellowship has been found rather to stimu- te than to hinder.

But it is particularly pleasant to dwell on the co- peration and united work and worship of the En- eavor Societies, which has proved to be such an xtraordinary, God-given development of the move- ment, and which is so fully in accord with the spirit f the times, and I believe with Providential leadings. verywhere today the Christian world is longing and rying out for a closer unity of Christians, for the reaking down of sectarian barriers, for the minimizing of unessentials, and the magnifying of the points of our common faith and practice. Scarcely is an important ecclesiastical meeting held anywhere but, in some form, this cry for united Christian action is voiced. It is frequently asserted that the Christian soldiers in the trenches, when they reach home, will never again stand apart in fighting the battles of the Lord.

FOR this happier time that is hastening on, the Christian Endeavor movement has been preparing the young people of the churches in a remarkable way. There was no thought of a great world-wide organization that should include all evangelical denominations when that first little society in Portland, Maine, was formed. It is a great satisfaction to me now that this is not a man-made fellowship, that no powerful organization with unlimited money and influential backing tried to force a new unity upon the churches, but that God has used one of the "weak things of the world," if not to "put to shame the things that are strong," at least to help in some measure to inaugurate and usher in the better day for which Jesus prayed, when "all shall be one," not perhaps in ecclesiastical organization, but in spirit and purpose and consecrated endeavor.

The possibility for cooperation and fellowship, unrealized by any of us at the beginning, seemed to inhere in the very genius of Christian Endeavor from the beginning. As soon as two societies were formed, the members wanted to get together to compare notes as to methods and especially for mutual encouragement and inspiration.

The Christian Endeavor Unions, local, district, state, national and international, came into being in the most natural way. The young people demanded them. Their spirits cried out for this fellowship. Their pastors soon found how such meetings enlarged the vision of the youth and quickened their zeal. They could not, thank God, be helped.

The first convention of societies was held in Williston Church, Portland, in June, 1882, less than eighteen months after the first society was formed. Then there were not a dozen such societies in all the world, but the convention idea of united prayer, common methods of service and a common source of inspiration was in that little gathering, and was soon to expand in a marvelous way.

Indeed, the society set the pace for such enormous religious gatherings as the world had never before seen. Year by year they grew in size and importance until in New York, in 1892, all records were eclipsed and more than twenty-six thousand young people from all over the land crowded Madison Square Garden, the near-by churches, and overflowed for outdoor meetings into the adjacent squares. The metropolitan papers, which began by giving paragraphs to the meetings, ended by devoting pages to it, and the reporters of the most cynical of them all, who came to scoff, remained to praise if not to pray.

The cheerful, happy, but genuine type of religion evidenced by the songs and the speeches and the joyous, badge-bedecked throngs of Endeavorers upon the streets, made a deep impression upon the city. The names of many distinguished speakers appeared upon the program. Yet it was not in any one or any score of admirable addresses that the power of the convention lay, but in what seemed like a spontaneous outpouring or uprising of the youth of the land, demanding an opportunity to express their allegiance to their Lord and their fraternity with one another. Dr. Philip Schaff, the most eminent church historian of his day, declared upon the platform that the convention marked a new era in church history, and, though some few ecclesiastics have done their utmost to postpone the era of enlarged Christian fellowship, it hard to fight against the trend of the present day, and what I believe is the evident leading of the Spirit of God.

A still more remarkable Endeavor convention was held three years later in Boston. Three great tents holding ten thousand people each were pitched upon the "sacred" Boston Common to accommodate the expected crowds. The preparations were none too ample, for no less than fifty-six thousand six hundred and twenty-five delegates were registered. Never before or since have Boston's streets been so elaborately decorated for any gathering, secular or religious. The railway stations within twenty miles of the city were decorated with emblems of welcome. One saloonkeeper, not to be outdone by other concerns, put up the notice:

"Welcome to the Endeavorers" whereupon a group of them took him at his word, went in and held a prayer meeting in his saloon, to the amazement of himself and his customers. He did not resent it, however, but stood the infliction with the best grace he could muster.

The Boston papers were particularly hospitable to the convention, reporting all the addresses verbatim, and stirring to white heat the general interest.

The convention in Boston was followed by others of like magnitude in Washington, Detroit, San Francisco, Chicago and other cities, varying in size, but all displaying the same enthusiasm, zeal and joy in our blessed Christian fellowship.

The project of holding a convention on the Pacific Coast at San Francisco in 1897 was feared by many to be impossible of successful realization, since it involved such a long railway journey for the majority of delegates. But the convention was not only one of the largest but one of the most successful of the whole series. It was said that at least twenty-three thousand delegates crossed the mountains from the East. The trains on some sections of the trans-Pacific railways were almost continuous, and a famine was created at the railway eating-houses along the route.

San Francisco was profoundly moved by the great and joyous meetings. The daily papers agreed among themselves to keep out of their columns all unsavory accounts of murders, divorces and the like for a week, and to give their strength largely to reporting the convention. Such meetings are now no longer novelties, but they are no less than formerly vast inspirational gatherings, which give a new vision of human brotherhood and of heavenly aspiration to tens of thousands of young people.

What the Whole World Wants

WHEN this issue reaches the hands of our readers, the Peace Conference at Versailles will in all probability have taken up its great task. As a preliminary measure it was prefaced by an exchange of peace views among the four Allied powers, in which President Wilson was closely associated. Notwithstanding the rumors of differences which have been industriously circulated, nothing has developed which would indicate any clash of interests of sufficient magnitude to imperil the harmony of the Conference. It is beyond question that the Allied peoples themselves are everywhere enthusiastic in support of the proposed League of Nations. This fact will have to be reckoned with by any opposition that may arise on the part of the leaders. That the President has made a deep impression in all the lands he has visited, and on every audience he has addressed, is universally admitted. All the evidence shows that the peoples of Europe want enduring peace to be the sequel of the great war. If such a peace does not come, then all the sacrifices will have been made in vain.

We have seen how, in other years, statesmen and governments have tried out their various peace plans, and how their efforts have invariably resulted in failure. We have just witnessed the tremendous punishment which God has permitted to fall upon those who break the world's peace deliberately. A score of kings and kinglets have been torn from their thrones; Europe and a large part of Asia has been filled with death and desolation; famine and plague are still sweeping off multitudes. Yet there has been given to us a glimpse of a larger hope than the world has ever known, coming out of it all—the vision of a new era for the race of men, if they will yield obedience to the divine will by abjuring war and resolving to live in peace. This is the vision that led our own heroes to enter the struggle, to fight, and even to yield up their lives. It is the vision, the realization of which, please God, will transform this old world.

The Peace Conference, too, sees this vision and realizes that peace and good-will is the strongest desire of the nations. If peace does not come as the result of its work; if it should fail to set up a League of Nations, then it will pass down to history as having flung away the greatest of all opportunities. Let us labor under no delusion in the matter. God is the Ruler of the world, and disobedience of his clear call to peace may be followed by still greater calamities than have yet happened.

We are led, however, to expect better things. We look forward in full confidence to the hour when the roll call of the delegates at Versailles will record their votes: America for peace! Britain, France, Italy, Japan—each and all for peace! We believe that with faith abiding in the hearts of the conferees, every difficulty will be overcome, and the League of Nations will arise, a majestic creation in the midst of Europe's chaos and suffering, with an arbitral court of nations created, and its powers sustained and its demands enforced, by the united strength of all the nations represented. Nor will any power be excluded which can qualify for admission, not even the Central Powers when they return to their senses and the present period of disorder has ceased, so that they may be regarded as capable of self-government. Moreover, we are sustained in this belief in the conviction that it is God's will for the world. We take it to be the conviction of all right-minded people everywhere.

Let the prayers of Christian America strengthen the hands of the Peace Conference during these tense days, when faith in God is most needed—prayers that the Conference may be wisely guided and that its deliberations may result in restoring happiness and tranquillity to the nations. There is danger in delay. There are elements now at work in various countries which, if peace be not securely assured soon, may spring to sudden life and involve Europe in still greater disasters. The world wants peace, enduring peace, guaranteed peace, and it wants it at the earliest possible moment.

Widening the Circle

TODAY our Family Circle is forty thousand stronger than it was a year ago. We extend hearty greetings to these new readers and trust that their hopes and expectations may be fully satisfied. This phenomenal gain we regard as a popular expression of confidence in the Christian Herald and in the new management with which it has begun the new era. We welcome them as a strong addition to our forces that are constantly engaged in the field of applied Christianity, for our Circle is a busy hive of workers, translating every favorable opportunity into good deeds. We welcome them to a share in our missionary enterprises in many lands; in our organized benevolences among those peoples that have been prostrated by the ravages of war; in fighting back famine; in spreading the Gospel at home and abroad, wherever it can find an entrance, and also in the great spiritual struggle that is now being waged for the unity of the Christian Church in America.

They have joined our ranks in an eventful time, when every day is history-making. We shall look forward to them as our weekly guests at a feast of the finest things in current literature, by the best authors—an infinite variety to suit all ages and every taste. And we shall be glad to have them exercise the privilege accorded to all of our Circle members of freely expressing their views on matters of general interest in our columns. The Christian Herald keeps open house for all of its readers, and values their opinions and suggestions, as an agreeable means of keeping in friendly touch with all the members of our big Family.

Nation's Tribute to a Great American

IN THE passing of Theodore Roosevelt America loses one of her typical citizens. Brilliant, able and forceful, he was in the public eye for a full quarter of a century. His skill in statesmanship, his uncompromising advocacy of what he believed to be right and just, and above all his stanch Americanism, were the qualities that combined to make him a leader among men and won a nation's admiration and confidence.

Few men have shown so much versatility, or have won higher recognition in so many fields of activity. As author, traveler, explorer, soldier, legislator and statesman, he filled every rôle with distinction. Whether winning the Nobel prize, or exploring in the wilderness of Africa or South America, or directing the affairs of the nation in Washington, he was equally master of the situation. Few men have shown such resourceful capacity for meeting the emergencies of public life, and fewer still have faced them with such courage and confidence. Yet always his action waited upon conscience, and his whole record reveals the most rigid adherence to his high conception of duty.

Mr. Roosevelt was at heart a reformer, and showed this in many ways. He believed in law, in equal justice, and in the rule of right, and he cared little for the antagonisms he invoked. His sympathies and energies lay closer to the hearts of the American people than those of any other statesman of his time, and for many years his name as a moral force in politics was one to conjure with. Time has vindicated many if not all of his digressions from the old paths of politics. Now that he is gone, his fellow countrymen, irrespective of party, unite in awarding him spontaneously the laurel that is the fitting tribute to the man who carried with him all through his public career the unwavering love and confidence of the nation he served.

That Captured German Fleet

WHAT shall be done with the captured German fleet? Shall it be sunk in the depths of the ocean, or shall an effort be made to put the big ships with which Germany hoped to conquer the seas to some practical use? Experts who have advocated destruction explained that all of the ships are practically obsolete according to modern standards, and that their appropriation and upkeep would be a sheer waste of money. This judgment applies to the battle-cruisers and battle-ships, though not to the smaller vessels, light cruisers, destroyers, and submarines. It would seem to the average mind that some better use might be found for those vessels than simply to send them to the bottom of the sea. Assuming the experts to be right, the naval powers might not regard the German ships as valuable booty; yet they represent possibly hundreds of millions of money spent, and even though worthless in war, there are doubtless tasks at which they could be used to good advantage.

However, assuming that these vessels, which are now in British waters, will never go back to Germany, and that it might be wise not to divide them among the Allies, the proposition to sink them on the site of the Lusitania seems to meet the ends of justice, although it is a shocking waste of money. It has been suggested by some interested reader that they should be taken down to the Sargasso Sea, and junked in that limbo of dead ships and seaweed, in its hopeless zone of perpetual calm, somewhere in mid-Atlantic. Even this plan, however, has its disadvantages, for some envious power might be tempted to salvage them from the mass of derelicts. On the whole, therefore, unless some better suggestion is advanc and since nobody seems to want them, we supp that the most logical destiny of the worthless fl would be to send it to Davy Jones's locker, as n as may be to the ill-fated Lusitania. This would poetic justice if nothing more.

The One Thing Needful

CHAPLAIN RIDOUT, in the article printed another page, has brought the question Religion after the War very near to a soluti Some good folks have seemed to be groping about a dense fog of uncertainty as to the message t Church should have ready for the soldier bo homecoming, as to the manner of organization, t extent of cooperation, the degree of unity and th basis of unity necessary to a successful continuati of the ministry of the Church into the days of r construction.

The answer is clear, convincing, and one alrea given more than once. What the men want the old Gospel that has always in every age been th power of God unto salvation. No ecclesiastic formula will answer.

It seems necessary to call Christendom ba periodically to its fundamentals. First comes time of spiritual drouth or questioning; then a gre leader with the old, old message arises to fire t world again with religious zeal. Huss, Luthe Wesley, Otterbein, Whitefield, Moody, all declar to a world of sinful men the all-sufficiency of t sacrifice on Calvary.

In easy times men forget that they are sinne and any philosophy which will not too greatly int fere with the comfortable current of their inclination can masquerade as religion and secure a certa following. But in times of stress the arm of fles fails, the power of philosophy, of specious argume of skilfully camouflaged half-truth is shown to be th weakness that it is, and men, crying out for realit come back to the New Testament, to the old Gospe

What the Church needs is, therefore, not a ne program, not a new message, but a return to th simplicity of apostolic days and to the messa which then gathered disciples by thousands in ever corner of the Roman empire. If the Church the will strip away the cant, the creed, the verbiage o other years, the ecclesiastical pose, the denomination emphasis, and preach Jesus Christ, the crucifie Saviour, the risen living Lord, the men back fro France and those who stayed at home will thro the doors and crowd the altars.

The Potter and the Clay

SOMEONE has suggested that the pottery trad began when Adam and Eve were turned out o Eden. Pottery was a great trade in the mos ancient cities of the world. The advance in civilization in those early times is shown by the increasin artistic development of pottery utensils. The ear life of Egyptians, Chinese, and even the America Indians, is found written upon their pottery vessel

As our Lord used scenes in nature as texts fo spiritual truths, so the pottery artisan becomes a picture of God's dealing with his children. Jeremiah the prophet is sent to the potters' field to study t great lesson for the instruction of Israel. The divine voice said to him, "As clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel! If they return to me, I will repent of the evil; if they return not, I will repent of the good wherewith I would benefit them."

God governs the wheels of his providence as well as the clay of his creation. He who made us can make us again. We are his workmanship and should not take ourselves out of his hands till we come unto the perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. The grinding, molding process may be often painful, but Christ was made perfect through suffering, and his greatest apostle suffered the loss of all things. We should be willing in his hands and be obedient to his command, if we would become a vessel of honor and power in his worlds.

Nations that are marred and broken by war, lying in ruins, must be made over again into governments of peace, prosperity and liberty. Is not Almighty God remolding such nations today, that all may become united in the purposes of spreading righteousness and truth and establishing the kingdom of Christ in the earth? What a wonderful privilege for the President and people of these United States to have a part, under God, of helping remold the world of nations into the spirit of the true democracy and freedom of all the peoples of the earth!

Unity the Hope of the New Era

IT IS quite generally recognized by all men of thought and vision that the months just ahead will mark the opening of a new era for the Church of God. There will be a long work of ldwide reconstruction, and of reconstruction here home as well. Nearly 4,000,000 of our choicest ng men are coming back into our community from the camps, the training grounds and the tle-fields. They come back with new ideas and als. Many of them return with renewed and engthened faith and seek work to do for the ster whose Spirit has upheld them in the terrible rs of actual and expected conflict. Others come k with a faith born of battle, a faith no less certain n that of those first mentioned, but lacking tionships at home, and these need to be welcomed a church in which their simple faith is not out of e. Others may perhaps have lost faith, or have nd their faith weakened, and thousands of others ne back with little change in their hearts from the dition of passive faith or disregard of religious ngs which marked them when they went away. e church of April, 1917, will, however, be unequal the task of meeting these returned soldiers with a ning program.

But it does not appear that we have with us today church of April, 1917. As President Wilson has ll said, "There is a tide moving in the hearts of n." The terrible cataclysm of war has turned de every current of former life and thought, and we turn to the task of reconstruction we have a new rld to face and people with new ideas and eyes more dely opened toward new ideals to work with.

As a part of these new ideas and ideals we are seeing marked drawing together of religious people of all ts and names. But while all of this feeling is actual d strong and is moving toward accomplishment, remains true that reconstruction is now upon us. e life of the nation is to be built now around new nters, and no practicable union of Christendom is ssible under a year or two or longer. The Church it exists today must make itself one of the logical nters of the new life of the nation, or it may find t, when all the glorious union that is contemplated achieved, it is not the factor in the life of the nation ich its great commission and the indwelling Spirit its Master make it imperative that it should be. other words, the Church must make itself a proper edium for the revelation of God to man now or it y find that men have received a revelation from me other source, or that they have satisfied themlves with some lesser boon. The Church of Christ ould be the focal point of every community. It ould guide the spiritual life and develop the social. s ever open doors should be the normal destination every pair of otherwise undirected feet.

EEING all of this, and anxious that the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ which has received a w baptism of power in the trenches, which faces ide-open doors the world around, should meet the esent situation in the full power and in the true irit of her Lord, several organizations have begun formulate plans.

The Christian Herald for more than two years s kept the question of the Church after the War efore its readers. Some notable statements have en made through the Open Forum it has conducted, nd the forces of interdenominational faith it repre- nts are even now drawing together into a working rganization. Plans and purposes are still unwritten, ut it is certain that the influence of the Christian erald Family is to be felt in a definite way in the econstituting of the Church for the new victories f the New Era.

The International Sunday School Association has en this problem arising and has planned an extensive ampaign to fit the Church, through the interde- ominational influence of the Sunday school interests, meet the new issues of life and community organiza- ion which it must shortly face.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement has planned nation-wide program, the Y. W. C. A. and Y. M. A. each have programs in process of building. he Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Congrega- ional, Lutheran and Christian denominations have ach, either in process or in practical culmination, ovements intended to invigorate individual churches nd to relate their whole bodies to the wider oppor- unities and obligations of the immediate future. he Women's Trade Union League also has a program hich is, of course, wholly secular.

Thus many organizations were working, but the eneral situation was still confused. There was no ssurance that even with all the programs fully chieved there would be that relating of the Church o present problems which would be necessary to ake its influence dominant in the life of the nation r of the world. And there was every reason to elieve that the multiplied campaigns would be ore or less mutually destructive and that the country ould be wearied of programs without being inspired to spiritual achievement. This practical certainty caused the leaders of various boards and denominations to get together in several informal conferences to see if some way could not be devised to bring about cooperation, all the churches in one unified campaign, which should put the evangelical Gospel of the Church before the country, in such a way as to insure the fullest participation of the Church in the reconstruction of our community life, and which would make certain that the men coming back home from the war will find a religious spirit here that will measure up to their needs and expectations, gathering in also by united evangelism that harvest of souls which seems to be awaiting the reaper but which may be lost if each should seek to glean only its own little field in its own ineffective way.

ON DECEMBER 18 and 19 a small group of men and women representing most of the denominations, the Foreign Missions Council, the Home Missions Council, the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A., the Laymen's Missionary Movement and the Commission on Interchurch Federation of the Federal Council of Churches, met at Atlantic City and after mature deliberation, much prayer and many conferences, adopted resolutions to this effect:

"That the conference approve the proposal of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council for a series of regional conferences, preferably by states, at the earliest possible date; that the Federal Council's Commission on Interchurch Federation create a committee to organize and conduct these conferences; and that the proposed committee clearly define the scope and character of the conferences and carefully select the speakers, exercising care to avoid divisive positions and utterances.

On December 30, at Delmonico's, in New York City, a slightly wider group met for a five hours' conference in which the resolutions of the Atlantic City conference were considered and the following outline of purposes was presented:

"To reassert the place of the Christian Church and its message as being fundamental to the new world order. A maximum anxiety for the Kingdom of God, a minimum anxiety for organizations.

"To strengthen the community organization of the Christian churches upon the whole task of the Church for all the people of the community.

"To give prompt help to the Christian forces in the period of demobilization of the army and navy."

BISHOP LUTHER B. WILSON, Methodist Episcopal, thought the time had come when we should rise above denomination, or a secular organization would arise which would set aside the Church.

Dr. Robert E. Speer said: "There is a demand upon the Church for coordination of forces. National unity among diverse racial and political elements was forged by the struggle for victory. The coercive power of public opinion forced unity of thought and action. The nation cannot face the problem of peace without unity. Great energies and sacrifices were called forth by the war that are abated now. . . . The Church must maintain the ideals of the war. Christian unity alone can replace the unity of national purpose which won the war. The nation must achieve an international consciousness: the mind of the nation must adjust itself to a wider conception of the world. The tasks that face us can only be met by all our massed force. No movement of the Christian Church, denominational or non-denominational, can afford to go it alone. Every branch of the Christian Church is going to have to snuggle up pretty close to every other branch in these coming days. What is wanted is just that we present a united front, that we come together on one platform and speak to the nation with one voice, bearing a new evangelical and evangelistic witness of the faith that is common to us. We must emphasize the personal religious life and family worship, the springs from which flow all that is clean and wholesome in the nation and the world. We have a common message, we have a common ministry." Dr. Speer also declared his conviction that we must accent the missionary note.

Mr. Frank L. Brown told of the plans of his church to receive into their church life the boys coming back from "Over There." He said they planned various classes and clubs to make the boys feel at home, but that the first two boys to come back had come to him to ask if there were not classes of boys in the Sunday school that they could teach. He declared it his conviction that many of these boys would come back seeking opportunities for service.

Dr. Hubert C. Herring, of the Congregational Church, said that there were three eras in the life of the Church—the era of the Primitive Church, the era of the Reformation, and a third era as yet unnamed. He said that the churches were learning the lesson that they could get together without losing their message of individual salvation and that in getting together they were gaining a message of social salvation. He declared that the church was, under God, the hope of the world, and pleaded for a drawing together of the sacramental host of Christ.

Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin said that in the elemental things of our religion we are one, and he prayed that the dry bones of our divisions might be shaken together into the body of our Lord.

Dr. Daniel Poling of the Christian Endeavor Society declared that over in France hundreds of men were turning to faith in God. Speaking of the proposed system of conferences he said: "We need first a passion, then a program." Quoting the text, "Without me ye can do nothing," he said: "More than we need unity we need Him."

Mr. Raymond Robins said: "The issue in the world today is whether the world is going to find in the Church the message she seeks, or whether the world will find it elsewhere. The greatest hour that the Christian Church ever faced is here now." Mr. Robins, who recently spent eleven months in Bolshevik Russia, declared the "solution lies in a better world and in a worthy answer to Karl Marx," and "unless America is competent to realize a Christian democracy, then you will get a proletarian socialist republic."

THE plan developed and discussed is to hold regional conferences, probably with states as units, and denominational representatives were asked to confer with their executive heads or governing bodies on the question of definite affiliation with the movement. Every church represented was said to be favorably inclined. The creation of a national committee was approved.

Mr. Fred B. Smith, who will be national chairman of the movement, declared that it was a movement to emphasize the "little brown church," a movement to defend the evangelical Protestant Church. He said the movement was not going out for controversy, but that it would preach cooperative religion and would demand of the churches coordination of forces. The desire was to create and foster an earnest, deep, spiritual purpose to cooperate, and he referred to the Indianapolis plan, operating in that city, in which, without the intervention of outside evangelists, thousands are being converted and added to the churches each year. He referred also to St. Louis, Mo., where all the churches have united to survey the city, each church being responsible for certain blocks on which it is to have ready a complete report next May. He declared that the Church could meet the as yet unsolved question of the adolescent boy only by a broad cooperative program.

There was a deep, earnest, cordial feeling in evidence throughout the five hours of the Monday conference. There were no dissenting voices. Representatives of each denomination or organization present pledged themselves to do all they could do bring their body into line with the plan for the regional conferences, and the gathering broke up with the announcement that the names of the National Committee would be made public shortly and that each person present might expect to find himself charged with some share in the responsibilities to come.

The Old Organ

By

CORA A. MATSON DOLSON

SHE, the musician,
Swept through the doorway
To a seat at the organ.
Mother-eyes looked down
From the portrait frame
Above the old organ.

Long fingers swept the keys
In accompaniment to a new song;
But the little organ,
The old home organ,
Would not respond
To the singer's liking.
She rose from her place,
Banging the cover,
To the words,
"A worthless instrument!"

Yet, old organ,
I shut my eyes and hear the strain,
"Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright."
In a minor key you keep the time,

"Sweet Galilee, blue Galilee."
Still, little organ, worn-out organ,
You can keep time to the old songs.

The Apocalyptic Year

*A SERMON BY REV. S. PARKES CADMAN, D.D.

TEXT—I Peter 4 : 19. "Commit the keeping of their souls to Him in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator."

WHEN the soul of the dying Saviour left His crucified body, there was a great earthquake, and the veil of the temple was rent asunder. The sacred shrine of the ancient covenant and the mercy seat was exposed to view. The Old and New Dispensations coalesced in the offering and the priesthood of Jesus. In His hour of Passion, He was made the Light to enlighten the Gentiles and the glory of His people Israel. I think of this supreme moment in history and redemption. I think of all the majestic epochs since it happened, and reverently assert that the events of this dying year have only been surpassed in thrilling importance and permanent effect by those that clustered around Calvary.

The fall of the Roman Empire; the rise of the Humanists; the Renaissance, which said, "Let us awake the great dead and inquire of them again"; the Reformation, which mothered Modernism, have been outdone by the revelation of God's will which we have witnessed during the last months of travail and rebirth. The thoughts of many hearts have been revealed. No soul has lingered undisturbed in its secret quests. No dreams of arrogant pride or virtuous humility have been concealed from the multitude. Prayers, which saints whispered in their closets, have been proclaimed from the house-tops. Conspiracies, which desperate and wicked princes plotted privily, have become public property. The veil has been torn off from many rulers and nations. Crowns and thrones have perished. Kingdoms have fallen to rise no more. The God of Omnipotence has come in judgment. His decrees have been executed by godly and ungodly alike. They have shaken the earth, from pole to pole.

It has been the annus mirabilis: the year, not of jubilee, but of apocalypse; not of victory, but of preparation and opportunity. The gravest problems have yet to be solved; the most vital issues are still joined contentiously; the final outcome is still in abeyance. It is safe to assert that the precept of the text is our wisest practice. Let us commit the keeping of our souls to the Lord in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator.

RETROSPECTIVELY, we look back and ask: Have I made the year a sanctuary of His goodness or a court of His justice? Introspectively, we look within for what is there of satisfaction or of dismay. Circumspectly, we look around as inquirers for the millennial age when hate, war, and desolation shall be driven to their dens. But the threefold look sees everywhere the flaming sword of Divine Righteousness. The devout ear listens to the solemn annunciation, "He made known His ways unto Moses, His acts unto the children of men." The fact is that God has taken our world wholly into His own hands, and preaches Himself to an attentive race. The entire religious sentiment has been marvelously reinforced. No erring priest or prophet comes between us and Heaven with a blurred interpretation. Behold the writing of Jehovah in movements and doings about which there can be no mistake; not inscribed on the wall of a palace, but across continents and in myriads of souls, writ large and plain, in letters of fire, with a host of kings and people to read, learn, mark, and inwardly digest. Hence consuming passions have been kindled, transformations wrought, unforgettable contact made with invincible realities.

Nineteen hundred and eighteen found us what we can never be again. The losses we have suffered, the tears we have wept, the raptures in which we have exulted, have left their eternal impress on our natures. The magnitudes of life at its best and death at its worst have thrown us back upon the great Giver of life and the Lord of death, the Creator, ever faithful, ever sure, whose mercy is everlasting.

IT HAS been a season of stern personal experiences and countless gains, a veritable Pentecost, in which men and nations of widely separated beliefs and habits have felt the impulse of a common sovereignty and the instinct of a common conscience. We are poorer in goods and richer in ourselves. The roll call of our departed heroes echoes interminably, but they have shown us God. Seriousness and dignity of being have followed sublimated sacrifice. For several decades before the war, preachers and churchmen were embarrassed by the wrong balance of life. The times were out of joint. The hearts of the people were estranged from spiritual truths. They leaned heavily upon what they were. They were not confident as to whence they came or whither they were going. Now, they have had to recommit themselves to the Creator and learn that dependence best becomes their finite weakness. It seemed a vain dream that in some far-off era goodness in saintly luster panoplied should monopolize the politics and statesmanship which had obscured justice and compassion. Nevertheless, we have not had to wait a single twelve-month for the turn of the tide. Silently, massively, resistlessly it is sweeping in upon the shores of human life from out the unfathomable deeps beyond. Presidents and premiers have taken the New Testament ethic as their mentor. They seek to formulate new codes which shall express the substance of the Sermon on the Mount. They disavow the methods which until yesterday were reckoned necessary in international diplomacy. We have not reached perfection, but we have banished skepticism. Foolish chatter about a godless race plunging into anarchy has been supplanted by a vigorous determination that civilization shall not be aborted. We do not anticipate an immediate spotless condition, but we actually have a chastened one. And the God of all history has reassured us that > "Though His mills grind slowly,

>   Yet they grind exceeding small;
> Though with patience He stands waiting,
>   With exactness grinds He all."

Evidently faith and reason cast their twin light upon the text. It behooves us through well-doing to be on good terms with Him in whose guardian care are all our works and ways.

CARDINAL NEWMAN once asserted that it better for the sun and the moon and the sta be hurled out of the sky than for one soul to com a mortal sin. Huxley ridiculed the assertion. Ne enough have been to prove that honesty is best.

all of us have been pure, but enough have bee of protection and defense over the rest. And this nant, this elect brotherhood of the blessed ones superiority to the faithful Creator. He arranged makes for our destiny is of Him. No taking of thou add one cubit to our stature. But while as Cre

He acts absolutely, as Redeemer He solicits our co

It is this differential which governs life's com cated machineries. We can never be sufficiently gr

India's Famine Spreading

An Urgent Appeal from American Missionaries to the Christian Herald for Help

APPEALS from famine-stricken India are multiplying. A missionary conference in session at Akola, Berar, C. P., has sent the following appeal to the Christian Herald:

"We, the undersigned, have been asked by the Christian and Missionary Alliance, sitting in Conference here in Akola to solicit your immediate help for the poor and suffering. We remember that in the great famines of 1897 and 1900 the readers of the Christian Herald made a most noble response to appeals for help. The results of that generous help are seen today in many missions, in the form of bright Christian men and women, who were rescued from death by starvation, and taught the way and plan of salvation through Jesus Christ. Then, too, thousands of helpless orphans were taken into our orphanages and not only fed and clothed, but educated, trained in useful trades, and Christianized, and so became not only self-supporting, but helped forward the Church of the living God. Hundreds again have gone out into the work as Christian teachers, evangelists, and pastors.

"The Lord surely turned the curse into a blessing.

"We are again face to face with more severe circumstances and conditions than prevailed then, for the three following reasons:

"1. Because of the World War, the prices of foodstuffs today are nearly twice those reached in the two famines of 1897 and 1900. To make this plain to the reader, take for instance flour, that was selling before either of the two previous famines at one dollar a bag, but rose in those two famines to five dollars a bag. Now that same flour is held at nearly nine dollars a bag! Let it be remembered, too, that the average annual income of the people of this land is said to be only ten dollars per capita. Also a very low rate of money exchange exists at present. Today, a dollar on the field is worth only eighty-six cents.

"2. The epidemic of influenza has swept all over this land, in a most terrible and malignant form, carrying off thousands of people, and leaving hundreds of helpless orphans on our hands.

"3. The rains all over the land have been a partial failure, and in some cases a total failure. We here get an average rainfall of about thirty inches, but this year we have had only eight, and in some places even less. The crops that had started to grow are now withered on their stalks and past he while in many cases the cro were not even planted. What poor people and cattle will do fore next September God al knows.

"We who have passed thro
two such famines, remember

Looking these facts in the face, we as a Mission, sit and to your readers for help before it is too late.

"Thanking you in advance for the help, we ask y not to wait to send the money in the ordinary wa

The Thorn That Remained

SUNDAY, January 26. II Cor. 12:8. "I besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me." Was the prayer answered? The apostle was troubled by some physical ailment which ained his strength and seemed to interfere with the itfulness of his work. It was like a thorn in the sh; it continually obtruded itself and mixed its in with everything. And he prayed that God uld remove the thorn, but the thorn remained. all we then say that the prayer was unanswered? as the Lord heedless? Might the apostle just as ll have saved his breath? Quite other is the teach- g of the Word. The unremoved thorn does not an the unanswered prayer. God most certainly swered the prayer, but in quite another way than e apostle dreamed. There was not less thorn, but re grace. The burden was not reduced, but the fferer was endowed with more power. "My grace sufficient for thee."

Here is a motor-car somewhat burdened and gasp- g at the difficult hill. There are two ways of deal- g with it. We can either lighten its load by remov- g part of the burden, or we can lighten its load by reasing its strength. We more than halve the hill en we double the engine power. And that is the y in which many of our prayers are answered. e answer comes not in the removal of the difficulty t in the increase of our dynamic. "Ye shall receive wer when the Holy Ghost is come upon you." any young Christians are bewildered to find that mptations remain even when they have begun to llow the Lord. They prayed that the temptation ight be removed, or that it might no longer frown on them as they went along the way. And yet ere it is towering before them as they go to their rk, menacing them while they are at their work, d accompanying them on their return. If only e Lord would remove all our enemies! But that not always his way. Many times the foes remain, t the answer is found in a table prepared "in the idst of our enemies." He gives us hidden manna, d the surrounding enemy glares at us in impotence.

And, just because the difficulty and the burden main, what an opportunity this offers for powerful itnessing! If the Lord removed all our thorns, if hristian believers had no temptations, no troubles, difficult hills, what a poor, anemic witness we ould offer to the world! We should present a char- ter that was faced by no enemy. We should pre- nt a life that was grappling with no problem. We ould present victories without struggle! Is it not mething infinitely more impressive to see a man ith a thorn limping along the road with a superb irit? What a witness all this offers to the endue- ent of God's grace! There is the man's thorn! nd we are made to wonder how he bears it so well. hat is his secret? Or here is a woman who has heaps trouble; where does she get her mysterious oil hich enables her spirit to burn and shine so radi- ntly? And those who ask such questions are led to er secret, and they are brought into the presence of e Lord. And so the thorn remains in order that we ay unveil the Lord. The very thorn becomes the vealer of the keeping grace of our God. "This sick- ess was not unto death, but for the glory of God, hat the Son of Man may be glorified." J. H. J.

The Open Door

MONDAY, January 27. Rev. 3:8. "Behold, I have set before thee an open door." The open oor represents opportunity. In the Christian view things, opportunity spells duty, and duty has ivine sanction and authority. Three sayings of esus shed light upon his conception of the provi- ential—indeed, the divine—character of duty: "I ust be about my Father's business." "It becometh e to fulfil all righteousness." "My meat is to do he will of him that sent me." It is plain what Jesus hinks of duty—to do it is to do the Father's will, nd to do his will is to know him, and to know him life eternal.

Said a boy of nineteen who died a martyr's death t a post of dangerous duty: "I knew I was follow- g Christ, and I could not do otherwise." The duty f our common or uncommon lives is God's open door o life on the highest level. C. C. A.

The Doing of the Law

TUESDAY, January 28. Luke 10:25, 26. "A certain lawyer stood up, and tempted him, saying, Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? He said unto him, what is written in the law? how readest thou?" Here is a catechization in which everybody becomes interested the moment he hears it. For any person who gives some thought to the question, What is to become of him when he leaves this world? would repeat the lawyer's query. But let us hope that no one will ever put the lawyer's question to Jesus from the lawyer's motive, namely, to tempt him, that is, to find out whether Jesus is teaching something that is contrary to the notions which one already entertains as to the way to heaven. The questioner was a conceited adherent of that teaching which prevailed among all the great men of his day, viz,, that man earns heaven by doing what God has commanded. He speaks indeed of "inheriting" heaven, but that was a conventional term with his sect. His main object is to find out what he must do, what he by personal effort must accomplish. He meant to go to heaven on the record of his merit, and what he desired Jesus to tell him was, whether there could be any work greater and better and more certain of reward than what he had already done and was doing every day as a devout disciple of the law. The Lord meets his insinuating question squarely by his masterly counter-question.

If any one comes to Jesus pretending that he is already on the way to heaven by the efforts which he is personally making to acquire righteousness, Jesus tells such an one: Very well; there is no fault to be found with the law. It is a most excellent law. Only see that there is nothing wrong with your doing it. W. H. T. D.

Our Sacrifice

WEDNESDAY, January 29. Heb. 13:15. "By him let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually." Loving Christ, bearing his reproach, proclaiming his blood, faithful in every good work to do his will—is not this our sacrifice of praise on the altar of our hearts?

Have you an altar of sacrifice in your heart? Do you bring your dearest treasures here, willing to suffer the loss of all things for his sake? Have you shed your own blood with his, stood alone for him, been cast down into the depths of suffering with him? Then you have placed your all upon the altar, enjoying the fellowship of his suffering and the praise of his glory. When all is upon the altar, we are to wait for him who answereth by fire and consumes the sacrifice, while the incense of thanksgiving rises to heaven.

Has your life become a living sacrifice of praise and devotion, holy and acceptable unto God? Then you will rise in newness of life and fulness of power, not conformed to this world but transformed into Christlikeness.

The altar makes the sacrifice holy. It sanctifieth the gift, and you are wholly His. It is a reasonable sacrifice you make. We belong to God; he is our Father; he loves you and longs to bless you. He gave you life and health and all things richly to enjoy. Shall we who have received these riches, these talents, give them over to the enemy as a general would betray his country by surrendering his army treacherously to the foe? It is our work to endure as a good soldier of Jesus Christ for our country, our Church and our God. Consecration is the first step in this great sacrifice of self that we may become the true children of God, having laid down the arms of our rebellion and become restored unto the beautiful life of the children of God. E. W. C.

Serving Christ

THURSDAY, January 30. Col. 3:24. "For ye serve the Lord Christ." Charles Lamb said he would gladly have been Shakespeare's bootblack. It is an honor to serve a king, and Shakespeare was a monarch in the realm of literature. Again, it was Charles Lamb who said, "If Shakespeare were to enter the room we would all rise, but if Jesus Christ were to enter, we would fall upon our knees." If Shakespeare was a king among men, Jesus Christ was—and is—the very King of kings. What honor then to be a servant of the Lord Christ! Yet such we may be, and such were those obscure slaves in Colosse to whom Paul wrote. They thought they served their masters, but the apostle reminds them that in serving their masters in all good conscience they are serving the King eternal, immortal, invisible.

It was this fact that gave dignity to those early Christians. It lifted the roof of their narrow lives to the very stars, and broadened their horizon until they recognized themselves as freemen in the kingdom that includes all other kingdoms.

The truth that transformed the world in the mind of the Colossian slave is yet to transfigure life for every son and daughter of toil, for every child of earth. We serve the Lord Christ—whether our service be in the kitchen or in the White House, whether it be well-paid or under-paid or unpaid. And, since our Master rewards his servants, what pay we receive now and here is but a little thing—our pay-day is yet to come. He who hires us will pay us in incorruptible coin. C. C. A.

The Law and Holiness

FRIDAY, January 31. Luke 10:28. "Thou hast answered right: this do and thou shalt live." The lawyer had answered the Lord's counter-question by rehearsing the sum and substance of the Decalogue, the royal law of love. What God requires in his holy Ten Commandments is not the mere outward performance of certain acts but a quality and disposition of our entire inward being out of which those acts are to spring. We can do the works of the law as they should be done only when we are holy to begin with. It is not good works that make a person holy, but a holy person does good works. Before there can be a good fruit there must be a good tree. God regards this inward quality and motive of the doer of the law rather than his deed. The motive from which all God-pleasing action performed under the law must spring is love—a love so engrossing that it claims our entire intellectual faculty, every tender and noble emotion in us, our whole will power, every other strength we possess, in fact our life and being. With such sentiments in which God is the absorbing thought we are to approach him, ready to spend ourselves in his service. We ourselves are but a secondary consideration, if we enter at all into the consideration. For whatever other service we may be able to render under this law belongs to our neighbor, our fellow beings. Disinterested, self-forgetful and unwearying service we are to render, if we wish to pass muster under the scrutiny of the Lawgiver's eye. It is an excellent and perfect law, and the fulfilment of it makes a person approved not only by his fellow men but by God himself. All that is necessary to obtain its rich reward is to do it—not half, or one-quarter, but all of it; not for a season, but all our lives. A person that has rendered faultless service under the law needs no mercy, no Saviour: he is perfect. But if man has not of himself the qualities requisite for the fulfilling of the law, the law does not furnish them, and cannot help man. "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law," says Paul. W. H. T. D.

The Answer to the Call

SATURDAY, February 1. Acts 9:4. "And he heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me." Saul was not a favorite child who received this special visit from the Master. For all Christ died and unto all his loving voice invites; all are precious in his sight, even the savage, the blasphemer and the persecutor. The universe, like a mighty organ, peals forth the melody of the divine voice, calling us unto himself. The music of nature, of the Holy Spirit, of angel anthems, of Scripture songs, all are calling to the bosom of the Father. How many answer, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth," "What wilt thou have me to do?" or "Here am I; send me!"

Are we willing to go, to do, to obey, to suffer for His sake? When he says, "Come unto me and I will give you rest," do we come, do we rest? When the Master comes and calleth for us to go and do personal work among our neighbors or into far-away countries, have we gone? Have we obeyed like Ananias, who was told to go into the street which is called Straight and inquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul? Have we followed the directions, and did we lead a crushed penitent into the liberty of the sons of God? How many have prayed to be excused from such a personal mission, fearing ridicule, persecution or humiliating refusal? We should have gone obediently, saying to the awakened one, "Brother Saul, Jesus hath sent me that thou mightest receive thy sight and be filled with the Holy Spirit."

Think of the honor and glory that came to Ananias, who helped to transform Saul the persecutor into Paul the greatest apostle of all time. What if he had refused to go? Another would have taken his crown, studded with stars, and worn it through all the endless years. E. W. C.

The man who pampers his body and starves his soul, is feeding the grave and forgetting the sunrise.

Service is the heavenly cosmetic that removes the wrinkles of doubt.

CHAPTER V

THE letter was written in a fine beautiful hand, and he knew who the writer was though he did not ever remember to have seen the writing; even before he saw the silver monogram at the top:

"MY DEAR FRIEND: I have hesitated a long time before writing this because I don't know that I have the right to call you a friend, or even an acquaintance in the commonly accepted sense of that term. It is so long since you and I went to school together, and we have been so widely separated since then that perhaps you do not even remember me, and may consider my letter an intrusion. I hope not, for I should hate to rank with the girls who are writing to strangers in these days under the mistaken license of patriotism.

"My reason for writing you is that a good many years ago you did something very nice and kind for me one day; in fact, you helped me twice, although I don't suppose you knew it. And then, the other day, when you were going away to camp and I sat in my car and watched you, it suddenly came over me that you were doing it again; this time a great big wonderful thing for me; and doing it just as quietly and inconsequentially as you did it before; and all at once I realized how splendid it was and wanted to thank you.

"It came over me, too, that I had never thanked you for the other times, and very likely you never dreamed that you had done anything at all.

"You see, I was only a little girl, very much frightened, because Chuck Woodcock had teased me about my curls and said he was going to catch me and cut them off and send me home to my aunt that way, and she would turn me out of the house. He had been frightening me for several days, so that I was afraid to go to school alone, and yet I wouldn't tell my aunt, because I was afraid she would take me away from the public school and send me to a private school, which I did not want. But that day I had seen Chuck Woodcock steal in behind the hedge ahead of the girls. The others were ahead of me and I was all out of breath, running to catch up, because I was afraid to pass him alone; and just as I got near, two of them, Mary Wurts and Caroline Meadows—you remember them, don't you?—gave a scream and went pitching headlong on the sidewalk. They had tripped over a wire he had stretched from a tree to the hedge. I stopped short and got behind a tree, and I remember how the tears felt in my throat, but I was afraid to let them out because Chuck would call me a cry-baby, and I hated him to call me that. And just then you came along behind me, jumped through the hedge, caught Chuck Woodcock, and gave him that awful whipping. I remember how condemned I felt as I ran by the hedge and knew in my heart that I was glad you were hurting him because he had been so cruel to me. (He used to pull my curls whenever he sat behind me in recitation.)

"I remember you came in to school late with your hair all mussed up, a great big tear in your coat, and a streak of mud on your face, and I was so worried lest the teacher would find out you had been fighting and make you stay after school. Because, you see, I knew in my heart you had been winning a battle for me, and if anybody had to stay after school I wished it could be me, because of what you had done for me. But you came in laughing the way you always did, and looking as if nothing in the world unusual had happened, and when you passed my desk you threw down on it the loveliest big pink rosebud I ever saw. That was the second nice thing you did for me.

"Perhaps you won't understand how nice that was, either; but you see the girls hadn't been so very friendly with me. They told me I was 'stuck up,' and they said I was too young to be in their classes anyway; and it had all been very hard for me, because I longed to be big and have them all for my friends. I was so very lonely in that great big house with only my aunt and grandfather for company. But the girls wouldn't be friends at all until they saw you give me that rose, and that just turned the tide. They all made up to me after that, and told me their secrets and shared their lunch, and we had great times. It was all because you gave me the rose that day. The rose was lovely itself, and I was tremendously happy over it for its own sake, you know; but it meant a whole lot besides, and opened the little world of school to my longing feet. I always wanted to thank you for that rose, but you looked as if you didn't want me to, so I never dared; and lately I wasn't quite sure you knew me, because you never looked my way any more.

"But when I saw you standing on the platform the other day with the other drafted men, it came over me how you were giving up the life you had planned, to go out and fight for me, and other girls like me. I hadn't thought of the war that way before, although of course I had heard that thought expressed in speeches; but it never struck into my heart before until I saw the look on your face. It was a kind of 'knightliness,' if there is such a word, and when I thought about it I realized that it was the very same look you had worn when you burst through the hedge at Chuck Woodcock, and again when you came back and threw that rose on my desk; although you had a big broad boy's grin on your face then, and were chewing gum, I remember quite distinctly. And this time you looked so serious and sorry, as if it meant a great deal to you to go; but you were giving it up gladly, without even thinking of hesitating; and the look on your face was a man's look, not a boy's.

"It has meant so much to me to realize this last great thing that you are doing for me and for the others, that I had to write and tell you how I appreciate it.

"I have been wondering whether some one has been knitting you a sweater yet, and the other things that they knit for soldiers; and if they haven't, whether you would let me send them to you. It is the only thing I can think of to do for you who have done so much for me.

"I hope you will not think I am presuming to have written this on the strength of a childish acquaintance. I wish you all honors that can come on such a quest as yours, and I had almost said all good luck, only that that word seems too frivolous for such a serious matter; so I will say all safety for a swift home-coming. I used to think when I was a little child that nothing could ever hurt you or make you afraid, and I cannot help feeling now that you will come through the fire unscathed. May I hope to hear from you about the sweater and things? And may I sign myself

"Your friend,
"RUTH MACDONALD?"

JOHN CAMERON lifted his eyes from the paper at last and looked up at the sky. Had it ever been so blue before? At the trees. What whispering wonders of living green! Was that only a bird that was singing that heavenly song—a meadow lark? Why had he never appreciated meadow larks before?

He rested his head back against a big oak, and his soldier's hat fell off on the ground. He closed his eyes, and the burden of loneliness that had borne him down all these weeks in the camp seemed lifted from his heart. Then he tried to realize what had come to him. She had written to him; she, Ruth Macdonald, the wonder of his childish days, the admired and envied of the home town, the petted beauty at whose feet every man fell, the girl who had everything that wealth could buy! She had remembered the little old rose he had dared to throw on her desk, and had bridged the years with this letter!

He was carried back in spirit to the day he left home for camp. To the look in her eyes as he moved away on the train. The look had been real then, and not just a fleeting glance helped out by his fevered imagination. There had been true friendliness in her look. She had intended to say good-by to him! She had put him on a level with her own beautiful self. She had knighted him, as it were, and sent him forth. Even the war had become a different thing since she chose to think he was going forth to fight her battles. What a sacred trust!

Afar in the distance a bugle sounded that called to duty. He had no idea how the time had flown. He glanced at his wrist watch, and was amazed. He sprang to his feet and strode over the ground, but the way no longer seemed dusty and blinded with sunshine. It shone like a path of glory before his willing feet, and he went to his afternoon round of duty like a new man. He had a friend, a real friend, one that he had known a long time. There was no fear that she was just writing to him to get one more soldier at her feet, as some girls would have done. Her letter was too frank and sincere to leave a single doubt about what she meant. And he would take her at her word.

SOME time during the course of the afternoon it occurred to him to look at the date of the letter, and he found to his dismay that it had been written nearly four weeks before and been traveling around through various departments in search of him because it had not the correct address. He readily guessed that she had not wanted to ask any one for his company and barracks; she would probably not have known whom to ask. She did not know his mother, and who was there else to ask? The other fellows were mostly gone to France or camp somewhere.

And now, since all this time had elapsed, she would think he had not cared, had scorned her letter, or thought it unmaidenly! He was filled with dismay and anxiety lest he had hurt her frankness by his seeming indifference. And the knitted things, the precious things that she had made with her fair hands! Would she have given them to some one else? Of course it meant little to her save as a kind acknowledgment for something she thought he had done for her as a child; but they meant, oh, so much to him! Much more than they ought to do, he knew, for he was in no position to allow himself to become deeply attached to even the handiwork of any girl in her position. However, nobody need ever know how much he cared, had always cared for the lovely little girl, who had seemed to him like an angel from heaven when he was a boy, with her blue eyes, and her long curls, and her shy sweet smile and modest ways. She had said he did not know that he was helping her when he burst through the hedge on the cowering ıe State Police salute :he body of the dead

The Nation Sorrows for Roosevelt

President Wilson's Tribute to the Dead Statesman

PRESIDENT WILSON, through Frank L. Polk, acting Secretary of State, issued the following proclamation on January 6, the clamation being cabled from Paris Vashington:

It becomes my sad duty to announce ially the death of Theodore Roose-, President of the United States from tember 14, 1901, to March 4, 1909, ch occurred at his home at Sagamore , Oyster Bay, N. Y., at 4.15 o'clock the morning of January 6, 1919. his death the United States has one of its most distinguished and riotic citizens, who had endeared self to the people by his strenuous otion to their interests and to the lic interests of his country.

As President of the Police Board of native city, as member of the islature and Governor of his State, Civil Service Commissioner, as istant Secretary of the Navy, as e-President and as President of the ted States, he displayed adminis- ive powers of a signal order and ducted the affairs of these various es with a concentration of effort a watchful care which permitted divergence from the line of duty he definitely set for himself.

In the war with Spain he displayed gular initiative and energy and inguished himself among the com- nders of the army in the field. President he awoke the nation to the gers of private control which lurked in our financial and industrial systems. It was by thus arresting the attention and stimulating the purpose of the country that he opened the way for subsequent necessary and beneficent reforms.

"His private life was characterized by a simplicity, a virtue, and an affection worthy of all admiration and emulation by the people of America.

"In testimony of the respect in which his memory is held by the Government and people of the United States, I do hereby direct that the flags of the White House and the several departmental buildings be displayed at half-staff for a period of thirty days, and that suitable military and naval honors under orders of the Secretaries of War and of the Navy be rendered on the day of the funeral.

"Done this seventh day of January in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, and of the independence of the United States of America, the one hundred and forty-third. (Signed WOODROW WILSON."
By the President.

Frank L. Polk, Acting Secretary of State.

IN ACCORDANCE with the former President's own desire, in which his family joined, there was no formal funeral, only such a quiet ceremony as might have been given to any other private citizen. The funeral was held at Christ Episcopal Church at Oyster Bay on January 8, and the burial was in Young's Memorial Cemetery, on a lot overlooking Oyster Bay Cove, which Mr. Roosevelt had himself chosen.

By instruction of the President, the Secretaries of War and the Navy offered to provide military escorts, but these were not required under the circumstances. Vice-President Marshall attended the funeral as the representative of the President and of the nation. General Peyton C. March, Chief of Staff, represented the Army, and Admiral Cameron McR. Winslow, the Navy. Former President Taft, Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Senator Chamberlain and General Leonard Wood were among the old friends who hurried to Oyster Bay.

A short prayer service was held at the home. The flag-draped casket was then taken to the church. The day began with a snowstorm, but at one o'clock, just before the ceremony at the church began, the sun broke through the clouds. The rector, Dr. G. E. Talmage, read the Episcopal ritual for the burial of the dead, varying it only to read Mr. Roosevelt's favorite hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light," which was followed by this prayer attributed to Cardinal Newman.

"O Lord, support us all the day long of this troublous life, until the shadows lengthen and evening comes and the busy world is hushed and the fever of life is over and our work is done. Then of thy great mercy grant us a safe lodging and a holy rest and peace at the last, through Jesus Christ, our Lord, Amen."

No eulogy was spoken and no songs were sung.

At the grave only the simple burial service of the church was read.

Young men of Oyster Bay, recently discharged from the army but wearing the uniform of their country, stood guard over the grave during the twenty-four hours following the interment.

THE King of England, Premier Lloyd George, Premier Clemenceau of France, the President of Brazil, the King of Italy, the President of Cuba and heads of nations and statesmen in all the far corners of the world united to assure Mrs. Roosevelt of their deep sympathy for her in her bereavement and to bear testimony to the irreparable loss the world had suffered. The telegrams of condolence, showed the deep grief which was felt by the people of all classes and of all nations for him who was declared by many to be the greatest American of his day. Newspapers of all parties agreed that the nation had lost a power for righteousness and a force for justice, and that the process of reconstruction would move slower because of the lack of Mr. Roosevelt's advice and counsel.

Hosanna! Hosanna!

How impressive, with what relief to waiting hearts, was the proclamation that all the shrines and sacred places of the three religions should be equally respected!

Delayed reinforcements of Turkish troops from Damascus, called to strengthen the former Turkish garrison, now arrived, and unconsciously precipitated themselves into the arms of the English.

A number of Germans and Turks, who were regarded with suspicion in Jerusalem, were now arrested and sent to various places of exile, principally to Egypt or to Malta. Among those who were arrested was Zaki Bey, who was sent to prison at Cairo. His friends among the Jewish refugees at Alexandria gave surety for him, so that he was released from prison and allowed to live among them in some degree of liberty at Alexandria.

THEN life revived in the city which had been ravaged by death. The new rulers distributed medicine and hospital supplies for the recovery of the sick. The soldiers shared their rations with the famished populace. As soon as possible, food was procured from Egypt. Seed was given to the peasants, and army horses and mules to plow the fields.

The English, although conquerors of the country, showed due respect for the native civil and governmental administration. They maintained their rule strictly according to the principles of The Hague Congress. At the same time, they did all in their power to ameliorate the situation. They constructed good roads. They organized a police force. In order to insure against the miscarriage of justice they exercised a certain oversight over the native tribunals, where Moslem law was enforced. They conveyed pure waters from the pools of Solomon into Jerusalem, and placed water pipes and faucets in the streets, so that those in need should supply themselves with water.

The inhabitants, assured of tranquillity and inspired with confidence, began to organize themselves and to develop a new order after their troubled existence. It was an impulse of life after the reign of death.

THE first to obey this overwhelming impulse was the Jewish youths—the remnant which had been concealed, hidden like the seed in the earth, and thus had escaped the general persecution. These young men demanded the privilege of fighting side by side with the English, in the conquest of their own country. Their desire was granted. A battalion of native Jews was immediately enlisted and the recruits increased.

The young Jewish girls were not content merely to be nurses and canteen waiters; they wanted a more active share in the great conflict, and certain duties were assigned to them in connection with the army.

The representative Jews of both the cities and colonies assembled and took counsel regarding the assistance which it was in their power to render. The English declared their desire for the advance of the Hebrews; many times, the message was heard from the lips of the British: "The land which we conquer is for you!"

The hearts of the Jews expanded with the glad realization that they were now citizens of their own country.

Versailles—and After

Punishment

THE eyes of the world are turned to Versailles. The most important conference in the world's history is convened there. The future peace of the world may be said to depend upon the conference. Therefore the principles underlying a just and stable peace are principles of utmost importance just now. More than human wisdom will be needed to harmonize the clashing interests of the various nations represented. But "there's a Divinity that shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will." And there will be many statesmen at the council board who rely upon and who seek wisdom from that Divinity. Herein will be found a reasonable hope for an enduring peace.

One of the first problems to be considered will be the suitable punishment for those responsible for the war. This question is not of the greatest importance, but it is one that the mass of mankind is deeply interested in. When a thief or a scoundrel commits a crime, the punishment of the criminal is not so important as the conditions which led up to the crime. But without adequate punishment a premium on or an inducement for further crime would be inevitable. There is no question in any one's mind that if our criminal law were adequate and if it were promptly enforced there would be a great reduction of crime in every home, every village and every state.

What then shall be done with the Kaiser, the Crown Prince, Von Hindenburg, Ludendorff, Von Tirpitz and their associates: those who are directly responsible? Why should they receive punishment different from any other person committing similar crimes? They cannot plead ignorance or lack of full appreciation of the awful result sure to follow their decision for war. They have not even the excuse of anger or intoxication. They made the decision after long, careful, cool and deliberate calculation. They made the most complete and thorough preparation. They taught and educated their people to believe that might and right were one and the same. They counseled and ordered the most terrible acts of cruelty, bloodshed and horror. They stand convicted before the conscience of the world, on evidence indisputable, of a brutality, a fiendishness, a deviltry, absolutely unbelievable if the horrible facts did not compel our unwilling acceptance. Shall such monsters in human form escape the punishment so richly deserved? Not unless our sense of justice is most foully outraged; not unless weak-kneed sentimentality is permitted to condone and to excuse and to prove that the blood and tears and death of our bravest and best is calling to us in vain for justice. The rank and wealth of these heartless and vile wretches should not protect them. A stone wall and a firing squad is a suitable, dignified and adequate answer to this problem. Let the punishment fit the crime. There is no reason nor any excuse for a St. Helena. England's dignified treatment of Napoleon is not justified in this case. Napoleon with all his pitiful weaknesses never countenanced a war of frightfulness; he never delighted in or gave orders for unnecessary pain, horror and death; he never played the part of a bombastic fool, and notwithstanding his unwise ambitions he left France, Europe and the world more than one mark for good that will remain to the end of time. To compare the Kaiser to Napoleon is to insult the name of the great Corsican.

Restitution and Indemnity

SO FAR as the justice of restitution and indemnity is concerned, there can be no question. If a thief is apprehended with stolen goods, no one questions where those goods should go. If the goods cannot be found the thief must restore to the owner the value of them so far as is possible. Over forty years ago Germany stole from France the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. Justice demands that they be restored to France. But Germany did more. Ever since that theft she has imposed outrageously on the inhabitants of those provinces. She has cruelly misgoverned them; she has made the name of German to be cordially hated by the great majority of people living there. She has conclusively proved her unfitness for governing other people as well as her own. What restitution shall she make to France? Merely to hand back the land is not adequate. In like manner the wreck and ruin, the unspeakable outrages, the unexampled cruelty visited upon the unoffending people of Belgium by the invading hosts of Germany, climaxed by the heartless deportations of men, women and children, all these foul crimes call for more than the restitution of territory. Adequate indemnity must be given. No indemnity, however, can be truly adequate in view of the sufferings, the needless deaths, the foul outrages, the bestial degradations. But Germany must pay so far as she can. When we think of the Lusitania, the air raids on defenseless towns, the use of poisonous gas, the breaking of every law hitherto held sacred by nations and by humanity, the stupendous debt piled up against Germany becomes truly appalling. How can she pay and what can she pay with? Already on the verge of bankruptcy because of war charges, it is clearly impossible for her to pay in money. Money, however, is but one expression of money values. Labor is another such expression. All employers of labor know full well the high prices usually paid for this commodity. And every one knows that labor is absolutely necessary for the maintenance of civilization. Furthermore, by honest labor even a convict may begin to recover self-respect. Perhaps by labor Germany may pay a large part of her colossal debt. She has many millions of men fit for work. An army of them should be employed under the control and direction of wise and humane overseers appointed by a council of the Allies. At first armed guards might be necessary to maintain discipline and to shoot any man attempting to escape. This army of workers should be employed in rebuilding and reclaiming the devastated lands of Belgium and Northern France. The wrecked and ruined buildings should be restored and rebuilt in like manner so far as possible. The farm labor should be obtained from the same source. In fact, all the industries of Belgium and Northern France should be supplied with the same labor so far as is necessary and up to the point where it would not interfere with or work hardship to the inhabitants of those lands. A moderate wage, say one dollar per day, should be allowed to every able-bodied German. Simple but sufficiently nourishing food should be provided by the countries receiving the benefit of such labor. Belgium, being poverty-stricken, would need financial assistance at first to supply such food as well as food for her own people. The Allies and our country would gladly make such loans as would be needed and at a minimum interest charge, perhaps without interest, considering the glorious record of Belgium and what her sacrifice has meant for world freedom. Such a policy would mean the liquidation of many millions of Germany's debt if carried out several years until restitution and indemnity had been received so far as possible by that method. The balance of the indemnity could be paid in due course of time by the usual methods after the industries of Germany were again reestablished on a profitable basis. By thus "working out her own salvation with fear and trembling" Germany would learn the lesson she most needs to learn, the cost of war, the folly of war, the bitterness of a worthy and humane punishment for resorting to war.

The League of Nations

THE capture of a criminal, the punishment of a criminal and the restitution a criminal may make are not, however, facts of such supreme importance when compared with the conditions under which he became a criminal and because of which others have suffered from the crime. Here we approach the consideration of what constitutes the fact of supreme importance in the council of the nations assembled at Versailles. What action can be taken that will guarantee an end of war? Or can any such happy decision be assured to a war-weary world? Nations are collections of individuals. The laws which govern individuals will often apply to nations. The conditions which result in the peace, safety and well-being of the family, the village and the state will usually apply to nations as well. Consider the problem in its simplest form, the family, and note on what the peace of the family depends. The authority of the parents is paramount. Without such authority, wisely exercised, the peace and happiness of the family is uncertain and may change to discord and strife at any time because of an unruly boy or girl. In like manner the safety and peace of village or city is dependent upon the police force and the execution of law. The same rule holds true of the state and the nation. It is no less true of the nations entering into a league. There must be som thority vested in some body; an thority which all the nations will re nize as supreme. An international a

Song Weaving

By CLARENCE URMY

ALL day a lonesome, little song
  Has called to me
From somewhere in the busy throng
  Of Things-to-be;
Its voice is like a mourning dove,
  Or like the tears
That faintly fall from fountains of Remembered years.

Twilight with trembling hand unveils
  The evening star;
I listen to the nightingales
  Of Things-that-are;
Across my lute a shadow glides,
  And from the strings
Float echoes from dim dreamland tides,
  And angels' wings.

Midnight and one faint, far-off bell
  With Fate confer;
While Joy and Hope couch in the cell
  Of Things-that-were;
My little hoard of precious themes
  Has added to
Its golden store this song of dreams,
  And tears, and You.

DURABLE
HOSIERY
Trade Mark

This is the hosiery that always wears so well

The real expert in hosiery is the woman who takes care of the stockings and socks for a family, and especially for small children. She has learned by bitter experience with the darning basket that it pays to buy good hosiery. She knows where stockings wear out first.

That is why Durable-DURHAM Hosiery has been welcomed by millions of American women—it is strongly reinforced at points of hardest wear. It wears longer because it is made stronger. The one who does the darning should do the buying and for every member of the family she should buy

DURABLE DURHAM HOSIERY

FOR MEN, WOMEN AND CHILDREN
Made strongest where the wear is hardest

There are styles for every season of the year, for work, dress or play, but every pair has the honest Durable-DURHAM quality that means long wear and true economy. The tops are wide and elastic; legs are full length; sizes are accurately marked; heels, soles and toes are smooth, seamless and even; the Durham dyes prevent fading after wearing or washing.

For Winter weather, Durable-DURHAM Fleecy-lined Hosiery is full of warmth and full of wear

Stockings and socks with smooth, soft, warm fleecy lining that gives real comfort in cold weather. There are fleecy-lined styles for women, children and men. They are good-looking and long-wearing. You should be able to buy Durable-DURHAM Hosiery at any dealers.

If you do not find it, write at once to our Sales Department, 88 Leonard St., New York, and we will see that you are supplied.

Mother Pins Her Faith to Musterole

In days gone by, mother mixed a mustard plaster when father had bronchitis or brother had the croup, but now she uses Musterole. It is better than a mustard plaster.

She just rubs it on the congested spot. Instantly a peculiar penetrating heat begins its work of healing —and without fuss, or muss or blister.

Musterole relieves without discomfort.

The clean white ointment sets your skin a-tingle. First, you feel a glowing warmth, then a pleasant lasting coolness, but way down underneath the coolness, old Nature is using that peculiar heat to disperse congestion and send the pain away.

Made of oil of mustard and a few home simples, Musterole is uncommonly effective in treatment of the family's little ills. It takes the ache out of grandfather's back. It soothes sister's headache. It helps mother's neuralgia.

Mother pins her faith to it as a real "first aid."

She is never without a jar of Musterole in the house.

Many doctors and nurses recommend it. 30c and 60c jars; hospital size $2.50.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Pr

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

IF NEW YORK CITY can do it, fellow Adventurers, why can't your town?

Do what? Why, banish all the traffic from the main street for one blissful evening, and hold a "block party" there. Yes; New York did exactly that. Its party was held on stately Fifth Avenue, and it was thirty-six blocks long!

You'd have to live in New York to know what a real thrill there was in sauntering up that famous street—where the autos are usually thronging past—as though Fifth Avenue were a country lane. There was even a full moon, to add to the "old home week" effect of it all. One had to laugh. It was like a jolly dream.

I SAW some beautiful sights, and some touching sights. Never was there such a party before in the history of the world. For sealskins rubbed shoulders with rags; and rags with natty uniforms; and natty uniforms with shabby suits. But beneath all these jackets there beat warm hearts. Laughter rang high—and friendliness. Every one greeted every one. Twenty strangers linked arms and, stretched across the street, went down it singing as they marched.

It was all spontaneous, all unstudied, all straight from the heart. It was—except for the Community Christmas Tree, which has become a New York institution—the only community festivity, in the real sense of the word, I have ever known the city to achieve.

Now if this sophisticated city of New York—this vast, rushing whirlpool—is able to turn its great main artery into a block party, your town should have no difficulty at all in doing so. Try out the plan, and see.

Neighborhood Birthday Parties

"FOR some years we have had simple neighborhood parties which others may like to imitate. They are called birthday parties. A list of birthdays of all those of party age—parents, grandparents and older children—is kept; and each month a party is given for those whose birthdays come in that month. Games are played, music is enjoyed, and refreshments are served. Someone is asked to be responsible for the fun, and three for the "feed." There is always a chance for men to talk politics, women pastry, and the younger people to have pure frolic. Each one goes home with a lighter heart and a friendlier feeling for all living in the neighborhood."—Miss Harriet C. Moore, Massachusetts.

That plan appeals strongly, neighbors, because of its very simplicity. For a lonely rural community, where the families are dependent on one another, and where all are acquainted, it should be ideal.

Our next adventure is another practical experiment, easy to try out and certain to prove worth while:

Mothers' Meetings

"WHEN we moved from a busy little city and into the country, I had three children of school age, and therefore was much interested in founding a Home and School League like those in our former home; for I felt that I needed all the help I could get in the care of my children.

"I invited all the teachers to our home for supper one evening, and we discussed an organization. The principal said she had often thought of having a Round Table or something like it. So the teachers sent out invitations to the mothers; and we gathered one afternoon and elected our officers. These were president, secretary and treasurer. Besides, we each agreed to pay five cents a meeting for refreshments.

"At first, the seventh grade attended to the refreshments; but as our organization grew we appointed committees to look after refreshments and programs. We meet on the third Wednesday of each month, the school closing at three o'clock so that the teachers can come. Twice each year we have an evening meeting and invite the men. During vacations, meetings are suspended.

"Our programs are something like this: a song by those present, a prayer, reading of the minutes, a solo or reading by one of the pupils, then the address, collection and refreshments. We have had some mighty interesting addresses. Ministers and doctors occasionally come out from a nearby town and talk to us: they giving their time, we paying their transportation. And frequently the mothers have had papers to read on some subject of interest to parents, teachers and pupils. Two other communities have caught our spirit and are now having mothers' meetings too."—Mrs. J. A. Miller, Ohio.

But we must not imagine that all the neighboring out in the country is being done by the grown-ups. The children are playing their part too, as the following touching and beautiful little story proves. A lump rose in my throat when I read this:

School Children Go a-Neighboring

"SEVERAL years ago, there lived in the little valley where I taught 'deestric' school a family in desperate circumstances. The mother was ill, the father unemployed. And the under-fed, poorly clad children were kept in school only by the compulsory attendance law.

"The neighborhood was socially defunct, without church, Sunday school or gatherings of any kind. The older school children, tiring of the monotony, organized a club, with password, grip and badge; and one of the members proposed that they help the children of that poor family.

"The club planned an entertainment and hand-bills were struck for them by the owner of a small printing-press. The programs consisted of readings, music, a good dialogue, and a darkey song and dance by two of the oldest boys.

"We smile now when we think how crude it undoubtedly was: but people responded generously. The next day the boys who did the burnt cork act walked four miles and bought dresses and jackets and trousers and I don't know how many pairs of shoes. The merchant's wife, a practical Christian, made the money behave like the widow's cruse of oil. The result? Glad hearts under new jackets; glad hearts, too, under the ribbon badge of a rural society."—Mae Smith.

Dear little neighbors! Truly "of such," as Jesus declared, "is the kingdom of heaven!"

And now we come, Adventurers, to a delightful instance of neighboring on the part of the newcomer instead of—

But I will let you enjoy the adventure for yourselves:

A Neighborly Visitor

"IN OUR little town a lady came from the city to visit a friend, the only person in the town whom she had ever seen.

"She arrived on Sunday, in time for church service, and at our little church was introduced to the ladies of the town. Her hostess was a busy woman who worked in a store, so she did not have much time for entertaining her friend in her home. But this visitor soon showed us that she had not come to our town to be entertained.

"She took the initiative and began calling on us busy housekeepers, who were so rushed with our fruit canning and preserving that we had not found time to call on her. She came pleasantly into our homes, offered her services in helping prepare fruit for canning, us recipes and helped in every wa could. She soon seemed one of us, we learned to love her very dearl

"Just before she left she ga number of us pretty little hand- jabots for keepsakes. I must not f to add that she carried back to city home many cans of fine frui remind her of her little visit of a m in a small town.

"This is the only instance I knew of a visitor making all the vances; but it worked charmingl this case, and doubtless woul others."—Mrs. Metta Dunn, Ge

I think that adventure will giv all a tiny twinge of conscience regret; for there is hardly a wo living who cannot remember a time in her life having gone, a stra into a new neighborhood and ha been filled with resentment becaus neighbors did not call upon her. experience is as old as the w But this solution is new.

And here, comrades, last on ou for today, is an adventure which carry a message to every mother sons "baching it" on the frontier, may suggest a wonderful opportuni some great-hearted woman living w touch of a group of lonely, iso young men:

"On Sunday afternoon several fellows came. We had no music strument, but mother has a voice, and with father to help a children chiming in, she had a re song service. It brought something the lives of those lonely boys; soon they were offering to br guitar or a violin to help with the m In a few Sundays, reading from Bible and prayers were added.

Hashed Browned Potatoes and Cottage Cheese

CHOP cold boiled potatoes into small cubes and season well with salt, pepper and onion-juice. Turn into a frying-pan well greased with savory fat, and cook slowly without stirring until the potatoes are browned upon the under side. Meanwhile, soften a generous quantity of cottage cheese with milk until it will spread easily. You may mix with it chopped parsley and left-overs of bacon or ham minced fine. When you have a smooth soft paste, spread it over the potatoes in the pan. Heat until the cheese-mixture is warmed through, then fold it over the potatoes as you would an omelet, and serve at once upon a hot platter.

The deft housewife will think out variations of any or all of these recipes for herself, as convenience or taste may dictate. I insert them because they commend themselves to me as practicable and suited to the present time of world scarcity and high prices. For although peace is proclaimed throughout the world we have still to make up for the losses of war.

READERS who fancy that those of our devoted women who went abroad as nurses and co-workers with the Red Cross and similar organizations find their occupation gone, now that active hostilities are at an end, may be surprised to read an extract from the letter of a dear personal friend, who has wrought bravely and well in France as an interpreter and hospital nurse for a year past.

"The privations are still great. We have neither light nor heat for much of the time. The gas goes out by nine P. M. I write by the light of a single candle. It will be long before the pinch of actual suffering is removed. We are allowed but one pound of sugar a month for each person; we have no butter, no milk or jam, and no desserts of any kind. My breakfast consists of black coffee and dry war bread. Sometimes I can get condensed milk. The real article is not to be had. I enclose part of my bread-ticket. . . . But what are these inconveniences compared with the desolations I see around me? Thousands of women have lost husbands, sons, homes and all their worldly goods, and still find strength to go on with life, and make the best of it. Marvelous people that they are!"

A MASCULINE member sends in an interesting question which I am forced to refer to intelligent parents, watchful of their children's spiritual as well as of their mental welfare.

"Please give me the following information: (1) What are the best books to read on nature study? (2) What are the best books to read to children on nature? (3) What are the best books to read to children?"—J. A. H., Indiana.

May I not meet the wishes of this father by keeping his address safely, subject to the good offices of those who may be competent and willing to reply satisfactorily to his queries?

We make room for one of several excellent recipes contributed by a valued New York correspondent, holding the others for future enrichment of our treasure of "Tried and Approved Household Helps."

Bank Guarantees 'More Eggs'

Wants Poultry Raisers to Increase
Egg Production and Help Nation's Prosperity.

Kansas City, Mo.—In order to encourage the greatest possible egg production and increase the general prosperity, the National Bank of the Republic is issuing a guarantee to every poultry raiser that if they will feed their hens the scientific discovery, "More Eggs," and are not more than satisfied with results, its small cost will be refunded at once. Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. "More Eggs" revitalizes the entire flock and makes the hens work all the time. Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs" and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 7151 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a package of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (prepaid). So confident is Mr. Reefer of results that this million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied, your dollar will be returned on request and "More Eggs" costs you nothing. Send a dollar to-day or send $2.25 and get 3 regular $1.00 packages on special discount for a full season's supply, or ask Mr. Reefer for his free poultry book that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry.—(Adv.)

The Mysterious Mr. Smith

it, and in that moment her mind was made up. She believed what Smith had told her. He had spoken as a man. He was no slacker! He was no spy! Allison's faith was very sure.

Then came the thought of his danger. They were going to harm him. She started at the thought of Smith struggling with the mob. She unconsciously looked about her as if for some weapon to defend him, and realized that he did not know.

Allison remembered the rest as if it had been a dream. She slipped out of the house, avoided the road, and struck up the long way through the wooded lots.

Her actions were crafty—as stealthy as those of the Indians that had once lived in the woods she traversed. When the way was clear, she sped with feet that seemed carried on the wind; other times she crawled through the bush. At the top of the hill she paused for a moment, looking back at the lighted town. Then she went toward the door of the big Colonial house.

Smith was on the porch. A low racing car that she had never seen before stood in the driveway, a man in strange habit at its wheel. Allison touched the dog as he came to meet her, and went straight for the man she had come to save.

"You are going away?" she asked quickly.

"Yes; I have just finished a message for you. But why are you here?"

"Because the men from the village are coming up here after the spy."

Smith laughed.

"Let them come. I shall be gone."

THE girl made a sudden movement as if to block his passageway. Smith, looking down into her deep blue eyes, saw there a wonderful light that pleased him.

"I shall be gone," he said slowly, "because my country needs me. A year ago, in pursuit of work, I was wounded—generally reported to be dead—and my country was pleased, for they wished me to rest, and be very strong for the time when they would need me again. The time has come."

"And your country?" she questioned.

"It is your country, too," he smiled.

The girl seemed to draw herself to greater height.

"I am glad," she said simply, her voice choking with emotion. "And you will be gone when they get here."

The man leaned forward, touching her on the shoulders.

"I shall be gone; but you cared enough to come up the hill to save me, Little lady, you believed in me; that means more to me than I can ever say. But some day—some day when there are no wars—I'll try to prove to you what I tell you now. I love you."

The girl did not answer. Her eyes told her story, and when he kissed her full on the lips, she smiled.

"I must go now," he said suddenly. "But I will leave you a hostage, a token. Will you care for the dog till I get back?"

"The dog?"

"Yes; and this—it is for you."

The man went down the steps to the big car. The dog trotted beside him.

"Go back to the lady," Smith said softly, "and care for her till I come back."

The dog hesitated, then with a low bark, as if he understood, he obeyed, and a minute later the man waved his hand as the car swung into the road.

ALLISON and the white dog had gone home that night with heavy hearts. When she had reached her own room, her lips still burning from his kiss, the dog curled in her lap. She had read his letter and was proud.

Smith—it was his real name after all—was one of the heads of the great diplomatic service of his country. His was the difficult work, in out-of-the-way parts of the world, and to him fell none of the glory. In simple, man-like sentences he had sketched his career, telling of his wound of a year before, and of his orders to find an out-of-the-way corner and stay there till his country should need him again. The less that was known of his actions, the better.

"I don't know where they will send me," (Allison read the last paragraph a hundred times), "but I shall be back, little lady—back to you, for ever and ever. You have believed in me, and to you I can offer in return my love, my first love. Whatever I do for my country, I will do for you—for the faith that you have given me here in this valley of those who have not trusted me."

IT WAS bitterly cold on the river-front. The wind cried mournfully about the corners of the steamship piers, and everywhere hung fantastic i In the big waiting-room on the pier people walked restlessly, anxious f news that the big liner now nosi way up the bay had reached the Conspicuous among those that was a fur-clad girl and a whit Perhaps it was the light in her be eyes that made men and wome at her and wonder; perhaps i because she sat so calmly; for one has waited a year and a half, minutes longer count for little.

Don't Forget the Bowery Mission

THIS great Mission, with its forty years of glorious redemptive experience behind it, with immense crowds of needy, perishing men surrounding it, and with magnificent prospects of continued soul-saving work ahead of it, is in need of funds.

To many Christian Herald readers that is all that need be said. But we wish all to share in the ineffable joy of giving to such a work.

American people have during the last four years felt the thrill of this particular kind of rapture, because they have been contributing without stint to needy war charities. In that old Scriptural phrase, "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver," the original Greek word translated "cheerful" is really "hilarious." People have been giving with unrestrained gleefulness. Why? Because the objects of their gifts have been so enthusiastically approved.

Over and over again has the injunction been heard, "Give until it hurts." At a recent suburban Red Cross meeting a young enthusiastic speaker improved it by saying, "Give, give, give, give, until it makes you happy!" Giving to the Bowery Mission never fails to produce this joy. How can it be otherwise? Surely there is no cause more in harmony with God's will and purposes. The supreme test of the sincerity of our religion is giving bread to the hungry, water to the thirsty, hospitality to the stranger, preaching the Gospel to the poor, healing the broken-hearted, bringing deliverance to the captives, visiting the fatherless and widows in their affliction. That is what the Bowery Mission is doing continually.

If you could attend one of the nightly meetings, and hear the earnest stories of men who have been redeemed and regenerated through the instrumentality of the Mission, your "joy would be full."

Probably the following few sentences from one of the "boys in France," who has been fighting for the cause of righteousness and civilization, may, in some measure, give the friends of the Mission an idea of the work it has been doing in the lives of men, and a little bit of satisfaction in knowing how well their contributions have been used. The writer of the letter a few years ago was a harum-scarum young fellow, roaming from place to place without purpose or plan of life, a "waster," a piece of human driftwood, a parasite. Scarcely out of his teens, he entered the Mission, found Christ and a new life, and when war was declared, he was one of the first to apply for enlistment. He made several applications, but was rejected, until at last, to his great delight, he found in one of the Western States a more lenient recruiting board, and off he went to France. He writes: "I have lost all thought of seeing Christmas at the Mission, and expect to be with the army of occupation in Germany on Christmas Day. But by-and-by I shall be with you. Then we can sit around the old table in Winners' Club, and, believe me, it be some gathering. We will h wonderful things to tell each o One thing I must mention now. have to thank the people of Americ their support, for we have had best the country could give. I h been able to invest $200 in the Sec Liberty Loan, and $200 in the Fou so am glad to have had a part in hel in this way, as well as being at front. Whilst in training we ha big fire and I lost all I had. I you could send me a Bible, as I h none now. My new Testament I h but I like the books of the Old Te ment, because they contain so m history and food for thought."

As the demands of the Bowery M sion at this time of the year are most urgent, do not fail to send your contributions at once. Checks money orders should be made pay to the Bowery Mission, sent to ca The Christian Herald, Bible Ho New York City.

The Mosque of Omar

RATHER a shrine than a true mosque, the so-called Mosque of Omar occupies a site sacred to three religions and possibly one marked by forms of worship now unknown. Mount Moriah, the highest considerable area in the plateau of Jerusalem, was early a place of prayer. Before David chose it as the site for the temple Solomon was to build, the Jebusites had worshipped there the god they served. It was called Mount Zion. As the site of Solomon's temple and the later restorations, the place is so interwoven with Jewish history and worship as to make its present use a profanation to every pious Jew. Yet the shrine which the devout followers of the Koran have erected covers a stone precious alike to Jew and to Mohammedan. The Jews believe this stone to have been the rock which served Abraham as an altar at the offering of Isaac, while the Mohammedans regard it as the scene of Mohammed's ascent to heaven, and they believe that he will sit upon it again to judge the world. To the Christian, the plateau, marking as it does the scene of so many of the Saviour's teachings and triumphs, is sacred ground.

Tradition says that, when Caliph Omar took Jerusalem, he inquired of the patriarch Sophronius which would be the most fitting site for a mosque, and that the patriarch led him to the ruins of the temple. The simple mosque he erected was later replaced by the great shrine we know today, which bears, however, the name of the great Caliph. When Jerusalem was taken by the Crusaders the mosque was consecrated for Christian service. Saladin restored it to the worship of the prophet. The mosque stands probably upon the site of the Holy of Holies of the Jewish temple. The former temple enclosure has been planted and beautified and is used by the Mohammedans for recreation, rest and worship. "The Dome of the Rock" is a regular octagon, about 60 feet on a side. It has four entrances. The sides are faced inside along the lower story with marble, and above that with tile painted white, yellow, green and blue. The Mosque of Omar may again be consecrated to Christian worship, or if Palestine is restored to the Jews, to the temple worship of the Saviour's day. We may see again the offering for sin upon Moriah, while upon Calvary, almost within sight, a Christian church proclaims the holy sacrifice, once offered, a full and complete satisfaction of the sins of the world. Or shall we see the Jew turning at last from the sacrifice of Jehovah to the worship of the risen Son of God?

The group in the foreground of this picture consists of Greek Christians and pilgrims to Jerusalem praying toward the Holy Sepulchre. They stand on a terrace of the dilapidated church of St. Anna, built over the grotto which tradition declares to have been the birthplace of the Virgin. At the left is the slope of the Mount of Olives, and also at the left is the principal entrance to the mosque, which no Christian is allowed to pass.

TRUE STORIES OF THE WAR

Real experiences of real people—written to the music of guns. From out of the holocaust of nations, the high, unbreakable spirit of man leaps forth in story after story.

For these 200 stories all the smoking, shrieking battle-fronts of the war have been ransacked. In these volumes, the theories, the practice, the prophecies of war have no place.

Here you will find the story of a man and his courage—a woman and her sacrifice—a courtesan and her treachery—a spy and his intrigue —a little child and his inspiration—and on and on for 200 stories—2000 pages—of life and death.

For most of us duty lies here, far from the places where men live whole lives in a day. But in these volumes is your chance to get away from bread and butter every day and drink the wine of eager life that these men and women pour forth before you.

For in these pages the doers, the fighters, the workers of this war take you by the hand and lead you through trench and hospital, under the sea and through the air to some thrilling story of a human heart and soul. These 200 tales of valor, daring and beauty promise that the human race today is climbing through suffering and despair to new heights.

YOURS FREE You have only to sign the order blank below, if you are prompt, to get the six volumes to examine, without obligation or expense, except a stamp. Do not let this chance go by without seeing what it is.

For besides thrilling you beyond any reading you have had before, 15 minutes spent each day with these stories will soon make your newspaper reading, your magazine reading and your conversation vastly more interesting and profitable.

TRUE STORIES OF THE GREAT WAR

REVIEW OF REVIEWS

For 25 Years the Greatest Monthly Newspaper. $4.00 a Year.

THE Review of Reviews is the world's greatest monthly newspaper. Its editor, Dr. Albert Shaw, has for 25 years been foremost in interpreting lucidly and authoritatively the month's history and personalities to the American public.

In the present year particularly, Mr. Frank H. Simonds has given the magazine a new distinction as a reporter of the war's current history.

Mr. Simonds is nothing less than a genius in giving his brilliant yet simply drawn word pictures of the movements of the greatest war in history. Do not miss the Review of Reviews this year.

Italy Still Fights. In order to fight the battles on her northern front Italy was forced to greatly reduce her armies in the Colony of Tripoli, and when the armistice was signed the Italians held only about 125 square miles about the town of Tripoli. On January 8 Rome reported that the Italian armies were rapidly and gallantly reconquering the colony, all of the coast towns having fallen, many voluntarily asking for Italian intervention and a just government.

To Restrict Immigration. The House Committee on Immigration, on January 9, had before it two bills intended to ilimit immigration for from 2 to 4 years after the war. Two influences are at work. Organized labor is anxious that the full opportunities of America shall be retained for the men in the armed forces who will be coming home and getting a new start during this period, and the students of social and economic problems and government also fear that foreign governments will make work at home so attractive that only Bolsheviki and other riffraff would be inclined to emigrate. Both to insure the prosperity of American labor and to avoid an importation of agitators it is planned to limit immigration, admitting only Government officials, skilled laborers, refugees from religious persecution and returning soldiers.

Railroads Present Plan. Before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, on January 8, T. Dewitt Cuyler, Chairman of the Association of Railway Executives, proposed a plan of railway reorganization recommended by the association as one which would give the public satisfactory service and retain all the advantages of private control of the railroads. The plan included the creation of a Cabinet officer, known as the Secretary of Transportation, who shall have general administrative power over the traffic situation, with authority to permit combination, joint use of facilities and equipment, and to institute necessary improvements in the service. He would also have authority over questions of rates subject to review by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Railway Executives recommended Federal incorporation, Federal supervision of capital and Federal control of rates and the figuring of rates on a basis to insure adequate earnings sufficient to maintain the roads and their credit. The plan also included the prohibition of strikes and lockouts with a Government commission to adjust all labor troubles.

The New British Cabinet. Premier Lloyd George announced his new Cabinet on January 10. While all parties are represented the majority of the members of the new cabinet are Conservatives. Andrew Bonar Law, Earl Curzon, Arthur J. Balfour, Viscount Milner, Winston Spencer Churchill, Viscount French and Austin Chamberlain are among the best known of the ministers. A new department of Overseas Trade Development was created in the new Cabinet.

Attorney General Resigns. Attorney General Gregory, on January 9, sent to the President a letter resigning his position in the cabinet in order that he might give his attention to pressing personal business. He asked that his resignation become effective March 4. In accepting the resignation the President commended the "singularly able and singularly conscientious" service of Mr. Gregory to the nation.

Court Upholds President. Judge Learned Hand of the United States Federal Court refused to order an injunction restraining the government from operating the Mackay Cable Lines and the Postal Telegraph Service. The court held that Congress had properly delegated power to the President and that the wisdom of the President's action could not be determined by a court "without substituting Government by courts for a Government of laws." The court found that the President was still in possession of his war powers since the country was still at war and would be at war until a treaty of peace was signed.

The Republic of Luxemburg. Following a republican demonstration on January 10 which was suppressed by Allied troops in Luxemburg, the Grand Duchess Marie on the eleventh retired from the capital and the Grand Duchy was proclaimed a Republic.

Germans Backed Villa. Testimony before the Senate Committee investigating the German propaganda, on January 7, showed that in 1915 the bandit Villa was largely financed by German funds.

Prohibition on the Way. On January 7, the states of Ohio, Oklahoma and Colorado ratified the proposed prohibition amendment to the Constitution. On the same day it was announced that brewers and distillers were organizing and raising funds to fight the amendment. The Idaho, Tennessee and Maine legislatures ratified the amendment on January 8, making twenty-two states, and leaving fourteen necessary to a final adoption.

New Director-General of Railways. The appointment was announced, on January 11, of Walker D. Hines, Assistant Director-General of Railways to succeed Mr. McAdoo as Director-General. Mr. Hines announced that there would be no change in policy.

Wireless Underground. A war invention, kept secret for strategic reasons, and made public January 11, makes possible the receiving of wireless messages by apparatus under water or beneath the surface of the ground. The apparatus is the result of experiments by Professor James H. Rogers of Hyattsville, Md., and was used by the American and Allied forces. Professor James' researches disproved the theory that wireless electric waves were absorbed on touching land or water.

Fragments of News. The delay in the conclusion of peace with the concurrent delay in demobilization of the British army and transfer of some veterans to Army Service corps, while units new to the service were demobilized, has caused some ill feeling among the troops in England. Several impromptu demonstrations occurred at various points. Premier Lloyd George on January 8 issued an appeal to the men of the army asking them to be patient, and telling them that the German armies were still powerful, and that it would be necessary for Great Britain to maintain a strong army during peace negotiations. He announced that demobilization was being carried on at an increased rate, and that 300,000 men had already been mustered out. . . . The French casualties in the war were officially announced on January 8 as 4,762,800, of whom 1,028,000 were killed in action or died of wounds, 297,000 were given up for lost and 435,000 were listed as prisoners. Of the wounded 700,000 have been completely incapacitated for work. The French colonial troops lost 42,500 killed, and 15,000 missing.

General March, Chief of Staff, U. S. A., announced on January 11, that 693,889 men had been mustered out of the army at home and that a total of 1,151,000 had been ordered released from military service. . . . The losses of the Scandinavian nations by submarine activities during the war were given on January 10 as: Norway, 1,822,000 tons; Sweden, 953,000 tons and Denmark, 680,000 tons. . . . The Republican National Committee in session in Chicago on January 10 adopted a resolution declaring for Female Suffrage by Constitutional amendment. . . . Late advices from Germany indicated that the Ebert Government had completely defeated the Spartacides, taking all their strongholds and over 1,000 prisoners.

Men are not suffered to r according to their eating" as days when manna fell from The manna taught the lesson leration and of a chance for all. hat gathered much had nothing nd he that gathered little had no We must find some way, under of duplicating this miraculous fairness in the supply of needed bread. Enough to eat seems to be one thing that our rich and prosperous nation should be able to guarantee its citizens. There always will be differences of wealth and service as of ability, but in our Father's house there is at least "bread enough and to spare" for all.

The Bible story of the Manna teaches us that the greedy did not profit by taking more than their share, while the weak and the unfortunate had their supply made up for them by God's providence. Likewise taught the Master when he said that the rich man was a fool for thinking only of stuffing his bursting barns with corn, while He urged his incredulous disciples to have compassion on the poor, saying, "Give ye them to eat." He bade us all be not anxious for tomorrow, praying only for our daily bread. All this we have to work out today in a maze of problems of industry and economics. Surely Christian men are feeling their way toward cooperation with one another and with God.

The Normal Care of Life

While we review again the great theme of human need, as we should, we must not forget that most of us who study this lesson have been generously provided for by our Father. It may be that we are fortunate above the majority of his children, and our hearts should be awakened to share our good fortune. Verily we have been fed! Are we grateful to the giver? Are we anxious to find a way to share? Or are we like the foolish woman who told her pastor that she had been praying for the necessities of life ten years and as yet had no cause to thank God for answered prayers! Have we, like her, subsisted all the while, so thanklessly?

Others have surely lacked. If you have not—then to your knees in praise! Have you even imagined what it is to starve? Then carest thou not that others perish? Keep up that subscription of yours for the relief of famine in Bible lands! "Jesus saith unto him, Feed my sheep."

Bread from Heaven

Manna came to typify above all else God's spiritual provision for his children—so wonderful, so constant, alas, so often unappropriated by starving souls. When Jesus came he declared that he was the fulfilment of the prophecy of the manna! All others leave the craving spirit of man unsatisfied. "My Father giveth you the true bread out of heaven. For the bread of God is that which cometh down out of heaven and giveth life to the world. They said therefore unto him, Lord, evermore give us this bread. Jesus said, I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall not hunger, . . . if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever."

The famine of earth today is even more spiritual than material. Like Christ, his Church is seeking to feed the multitudes in the desert places of Palestine once more. Like him she sees the still more urgent need, in the plenteous West as in the suffering East, of bread for the souls of men. United by the vision of her Lord sending her forth anew, the Church moves forward into a new era of Christian ministry to all the world.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN

Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Sunday School Evangelism

A SERIOUS situation faces the Sunday school workers of North America. The devotion of teachers and scholars to wartime activities has apparently slowed up accessions from the Sunday school into the church. These accessions have normally been over eighty per cent of all new church memberships. In the quadrennium ending with 1917 the accessions in this continent were 1,582,575, an average of 7,600 per Sunday.

But at the same convention at Buffalo where these facts were reported it was also said by Dr. Edgar Blake, secretary of the Sunday School Work of the Methodist Church, that twenty-eight denominations had in 1917 only one-fifth of the accessions from the Sunday school to the church, that they had in 1916.

It is therefore of the utmost importance that all Sunday schools and Sunday school workers should face the situation seriously and plan a great campaign this fall and winter to secure enlistments for Christ and the Kingdom.

Even in these summer and fall days a beginning can be made by the earnest teacher. One Sunday school teacher invited his sixteen boys to go off camping with him. He made it a point to speak to each boy about his decision for Christ during those care-free days. On the Sunday following the return of the boys every boy in the class but one united with the church.

In one of the Billy Sunday meetings in Boston a test was made of the time of life when those present decided to be Christians. There were twelve thousand present. Of these ten thousand, or over eighty per cent., had decided before they were twenty, and nine thousand of them made that decision through the Sunday school. One thousand decided after twenty and before forty; thirty-seven after forty; five after fifty, and one after sixty.

Dr. Chapman tested the Christian decision of the four thousand delegates at the International Sunday School Convention at San Francisco. Of these three thousand, two hundred and sixty had decided before they were sixteen. Dr. Chapman was so profoundly impressed by the facts that he told the writer he was seriously considering changing the emphasis in his revival work from adulthood to the years under twenty.

The Sunday School Committee on Evangelism

In promoting evangelism in the Sunday school it is important that there should be a Committee on Evangelism, which shall plan well in advance for Decision Day, and throughout the year shall develop a school spirit favorable to evangelism.

This committee should consist of the pastor, the superintendent and a teacher in the small school, and in the larger school the department superintendents should be added. This committee has some distinct duties.

There is a very rich literature dealing with Sunday school evangelism. The Evangelism Committee should know this material and should distribute it at the right time, to prepare for special efforts in connection with Decision Day and in building up the spiritual life of the school. For their own guidance the members of the committee should read: "Sunday School Evangelism" (Mahy); "Educational Evangelism" (McKinley); "Leaflets on Sunday School Evangelism" (International Sunday School Association); "Spiritual Life in the Sunday School" (Chapman); "The Child for Christ" (McKinley).

Methods. The committee should keep in an evangelism record and plan book a record of the scholars of the school, their addresses, date, and age of scholar when record is made, and opposite each name should be placed the Christian record.

Scholars who the record showed had not come into the church could be made the subject of special mention for prayer in the teachers' prayer gatherings.

All of this could be made the subject of report year by year to the Teachers' Council and to the church, and would prove of the utmost value to the future work of evangelism.

Letters and Card Forms. Another important part of the committee's service is to preserve for use the best forms of personal letters to teachers, scholars and parents. Before Decision Day such letters, enclosing some helpful leaflet, are invaluable in producing an attitude of mind favorable to a right response and in bringing teachers and parents into a spirit of cooperation. In a later contribution in this series forms of such letters which have been used with success, together with forms of decision and consecration cards, will be given.

Decision Day. The chief interest of the committee will relate to preparations for the school's Decision Service and the conserving of the results of that service. Plans for this special day will be set out later. Many schools do not confine their efforts to a single Decision Day, but make a steady effort to create atmosphere favorable to decision, and then at certain times gather in the results—in November, the first Sunday of the new year, Decision Day in February, Palm Sunday, Children's Day.

Wilson and Foch say

"A man has deprived himself of the best there is in the world who has deprived himself of intimate knowledge of the Bible." —Pres. Wilson.

"The Bible is certainly the best preparation that you can give to an American soldier going into battle to sustain his magnificent ideal and faith." —Marshal Foch to N. Y. Bible Society.

Paint Without Oil

Remarkable Discovery That Cuts Down the Cost of Paint Seventy-Five Per Cent.

A Free Trial Package is Mailed to Everyone Who Writes

A. L. Rice, a prominent manufacturer of Adams, N. Y., has discovered a process of making a new kind of paint without the use of oil. He calls it Powdrpaint. It comes in the form of a dry powder, and all that is required is cold water to make a paint weather proof, fire proof, sanitary and durable for outside or inside painting. It is the cement principle applied to paint. It adheres to any surface, wood, stone or brick, spreads and looks like oil paint and costs about one-fourth as much.

Write to Mr. A. L. Rice, Manufacturer, 107 North Street, Adams, N. Y., and he will send you a free trial package, also color card and full information showing you how you can save many dollars. Write today.

This Big Flag Sent Free! If You Ask At Once

Reproduced from actual photograph. Flag is 4x6 Feet. Double-Stitched Stripes. Brilliant Colors.

WELCOME OUR HEROES HOME

HERE is a wonderful opportunity to secure a big, strongly made American flag at way below the cost of manufacture. It will be sent free for the asking, and you can examine it in your own home if you act promptly.

Every good American should show his colors these days. Celebrate our victories by displaying this fine symbol of our national unity. Fly your flag when the boys come home, on holidays, for parades, reunions, and patriotic occasions. Let this big flag tell the story of your joy at this great moment of our country's history.

Act Quickly

THIS offer will be withdrawn as soon as our present supply of flags is gone. American flags of this kind have doubled in price and we will not be able to replenish our supply except at another increase in cost to us. Our original order for thousands gave us the advantage of a big reduction in price and we are giving you the benefit of it. At the rate the flags have started to go, they cannot last long.

Don't Send a Penny-See the Flag First

TO MAKE sure of your flag you must ask for it now. Our supply is limited, and when our present stock is gone it is certain we cannot obtain more at the low prices at which we contracted for these.

The great demand for flags and the scarcity of labor has forced the manufacturers to more than double their price and these flags cost us more than twice what they did formerly.

Fill in the coupon printed below and mail it to us. The flag will be sent you at once, prepaid, for examination. If you decide to keep it send us only one dollar within five days of receipt of the flag and one dollar a month for three months, making $4 in all. If your name is not on our subscription books, or if you have not renewed, we advise you to decide quickly to take advantage of the opportunity.

Upon the payment of your first dollar your subscription to the Christian Herald is entered at once for the period of one year, 52 issues, and you will start receiving it next week. The regular subscription price of the Christian Herald is now $2.50 a year, so you will readily realize what a bargain this combination offer is. You not only get this big 4 x 6 foot American flag with double-stitched stripes, but you become one of that great circle of 300,000 fine men and women who are known the world over as the "Christian Herald Family."

Mail the Coupon Now

THERE is no risk in this for you at all. Simply fill out the blank spaces in the coupon and mail it to us now. The flag will be sent you immediately. Look it over at your leisure. You need not keep it if you are not convinced that you are getting wonderful value. Before five days have passed send us only $1 and your subscription to the Christian Herald will be entered immediately. The other three payments of $1 each include the balance for the flag and also for your subscription to the Christian Herald for a year. Delay means disappointment. Start the coupon to us today.

He is elder and voluntarily takes care of the urch, building the fires, ringing the bell. This year he brought in the church's ristmas tree ahead of time—a beautiful e, which he carried two miles to the church lding. We wonder if any of our readers match this record of an octogenarian.

Many of our rural pastors are taking a p interest in the problem of the Church er the War. We are glad to hear from them the subject. Rev. E. A. Oldenburg, of First Presbyterian Church, Watertown, D., writes: "I have naturally been much erested in the compendium of thought con- ning the work of the Church after the war. has been most gratifying that the old foun- tion truths were so universally reaffirmed. e leadership of the Church is true to the e, thank God for that! We have been a le sorry, however, that there was lacking efinite plan of procedure, and we hope that s may still be found and acted upon, perhaps through the Executive Council of the Federated Churches. The Ministers' Association of Watertown, S. D., feel that one definite action ought immediately to be taken by the Church; it ought to request that the meetings of the Peace Conference be opened with prayer. Surely there is no better opportunity to emphasize the need of God in the affairs of nations than that particular opportunity. America, on which so much has depended for the successful issue of the conflict, and which asks nothing for itself, may surely make this fairest of all requests. The Ministers' Association has therefore petitioned that the request be heard in the name of the Federated Churches of Christ in America. To bring this matter before the Christian people of America the assistance of your valuable paper would certainly be appreciated."

The FIRST BOYS RETURN

by Margaret E. Sangster

International [illegible]

THEY come like youth triumphant, with vivid flags unfurled:
They come to tell the story of an awakened world;
With steps that do not falter and eyes that smile ahead,
They come like souls returning to greet us from the dead!

They never flinched at horror, they never turned from pain;
Ah, they have stumbled forward amid the blinding rain
Of shrapnel that has flailed them, and bullets that have torn,
And in the scarlet tumult their souls have been reborn.

We wait them, eyes half-blinded with tears of more than joy;
A maiden sees her lover; a mother breathes, "My boy!"
And all about the column there throbs upon the air
A thrill that grips the heartstrings and tunes them to a prayer.

They come, bronzed faces glowing; they come, proud heads held high;
They come, the living symbol that right shall never die;
They come like youth exultant, with vivid flags unfurled,
To shout aloud the triumph of an awakened world!

Rev. W. B. Allison, of the Guatemala Mission (who distributed Christian Herald relief funds after the late earthquake in that city), writes: "The work of rebuilding and at the same time carrying on preaching and looking after our publishing house, while many of our helpers have gone to the United States, has almost snowed us under. It gives me pleasure to report that the half of the $561.87 sent by the Christian Herald was turned over at once to Brother A. E. Bishop, who is at the head of the other mission in this city. The part that fell to our mission has been expended in a number of ways, including the supplying of roofing to protect needy people from these terrible tropical downpours of rain. The help has been a wonderful blessing to many. A number of families have been aided. We have helped many who were ill and temporarily out of employment. Others we have helped with food and medicines and clothing. We have used all the tact and discretion possible to make a wise distribution of the sums so generously entrusted to our care. We thank you most heartily for the means that you have placed in our hands with which to help the needy people."

I. C., Utah. In your issue of November 27 I note your answer to A. D., Scranton, Iowa, regarding the Mormon political control in the Western states. The pending amendment to the National Constitution affecting polygamy makes it important, it seems to me, that one should know the true status of the case in hand. The Mormons have absolute political control in Utah and a balance of power in the states of Idaho, Wyoming, Nevada, New Mexico and Arizona, with a large following in Colorado also. If you think "Mormon political activity has greatly decreased," just note the attitude of the senators from these states regarding the amendment referred to.

Mrs. S., Long Beach, Calif., writes claiming several cases in that locality in which the use of onions has apparently given immunity against influenza.

Interested. The first American harvest festival was in 1621 at Plymouth, Mass., when the Pilgrim fathers celebrated the ingathering of their first crop on American soil. It was doubtless the transplanting and adaptation of a Dutch and English custom. First in one settlement, then in another, then in one state after another, the custom gradually spread of setting aside by public authority some particular day to render thanks to God for special deliverance and various blessings, including a good harvest. During the Revolution, Congress recommended days of general thanksgiving and, as a national institution, the first thanksgiving day was December 18, 1777, the occasion being the surrender of Burgoyne. The first Presidential proclamation recommending national thanksgiving was issued by George Washington, who appointed November 26, 1789, its cause being the ratification of the Constitution. President Madison in 1815 appointed a day of thanksgiving for peace. There were no other national thanksgiving days until the time of our Civil War, when President Lincoln revived the custom, and our first national harvest Thanksgiving was ordered by him for Thursday, November 26, 1863. His precedent has been followed by his successors.

Mrs. C. A. H., Dresden, Ontario. The footnote in your copy of Josephus' Antiquities, relating to the punishment David inflicted upon the Ammonites, is probably Professor Whiston's personal comment expressing the fact that they were made to perform the most menial and arduous labor. Commentators clearly differ on the point whether the passage means that they were put to death, the majority holding that it does not.

S. M. U., Chandler, Ariz. He and his family are members of the Presbyterian Church.

E. B. T., Norfolk, Va. We have sent your letter to Dr. Gray.

J. B. W., Ottawa, Ohio. The nation paused at noon to pray for victory and God answered quickly. Why not continue this noon pause and pray for thanksgiving and prayer for help in the very difficult adjustment now before us at the Peace Conference?

We heartily agree that the Peace Conference is a subject for the prayers of believing Christians that it may be wisely directed. We believe there are very many who are sending up their petitions in its behalf daily, churches and individuals.

J. H., Hot Springs, Ark. There is no record in the Scripture of Christ establishing any church in the sense of organizing one. The churches which sprang up under the teachings of the apostles after his death and ascension had very little in common with the church of the sixteenth century. The Reformation brought the Church back to Christ's own teaching.

Student, Northfield, Mass. The difference between the Hellenic and Judaic view of life is characteristic of the two races. The Hellenic or Greek idea of the development of human character was that the elevation of it must come through culture and philosophy. Graceful statues, fine buildings, beautiful pictures, reading, and athletic sports would contribute. The Hebraic or Judaic conception was that in righteousness alone was there hope of human progress and development. You find it in the Psalms and the Prophets reiterated again and again.

S. S., Winchester, Va. Many parents undergo experiences like those you describe. Comparatively few have cause to reproach themselves with having said "too much" about religion to their children. A more common cause, and one that is much more culpable, is that they have said too little. You are spared that self-reproach, having done your whole duty as you saw it. Continue to pray for them and comfort yourself with the assurance that a mother's prayers reach up to the throne of God, and the influence and example of her pious life are never wholly forgotten even by the most wayward child.

Mrs. N. A. B., Osceola, Mo. 1. The terms "soul" and "spirit" are often used interchangeably, and it is difficult to define the difference. Indeed, some hold that man is composed of only the two elements—soul and body. Others, however, recognize the distinction between the two, which is also confirmed by several passages of Scripture, such as I Thess. 5 : 23. Colloquially defined, the soul usually stands for the life, the affections, the will or consciousness; while the spirit stands for the higher elements by which we apprehend spiritual truth. 2. There is but one way to salvation, and that is to believe on Jesus Christ and his redeeming work. Christ taught this over and over again, and his Church after him. A part of this belief and a necessary part of it is to believe that Christ ascended to heaven from whence he came, for without the resurrection and ascension Christ's work would have been incomplete.

Colors and Patterns for Every Room in the House

THERE is nothing haphazard about Congoleum Art-Rug designs and colors. They are planned by specialists who have devoted their lives to the art of producing patterns and color combinations that meet the demand for artistic floor-coverings for every home need.

Congoleum designs are printed in seven to twelve colors on a special base material that is durable, sanitary and economical, making a tough surface that resists wear wonderfully.

Other Congoleum Features

Owing to the sanitary body and firm, non-absorbent surface Congoleum Art-Rugs can be cleaned in a few seconds with a damp mop. How much easier this is than to sweep and pound the dirt out of a fabric rug.

They lie flat on the floor and do not curl or kick up. They never interfere with swinging doors.

You save money from the day you buy Congoleum Art-Rugs because of their low price and remarkable wearing qualities. The sizes and prices are:

6x9 feet $8.75; 7½x9 feet $10.60; 9x9 feet $12.75; 9 x 10½ feet $14.85; 9 x 12 feet $17.00.

Congoleum Floor-Coverings

Congoleum Art-Carpets (3 yards wide)—our newest product. Their extra width enables you to cover many rooms without a seam. Made in beautiful 12-color patterns suitable for living-room, bedroom, dining-room, hall, etc. Price $1.25 per square yard.

Congoleum (2 yards wide)—the original Congoleum for use over the entire floor. Made in the usual floor-covering width of 2 yards and in a wide range of splendid patterns for kitchen, bathroom, pantry, etc. Prices $1.15 per square yard.

Prices in the Far West and South average 15 per cent higher than those quoted; in Canada prices average 25 per cent higher. All prices subject to change without notice.

TRUE LOVE TRIUMPHANT

A SHORT STORY OF A WOUNDED SOLDIER AND HIS FAITHFUL SWEETHEART

BY HELEN A. SPAFFORD

PURPOSE

THE RULING SENSIBLE AUTOMOBILE VALUE

The Model 90 Overland Thrift Car

THE one big light of a single purpose has always guided this Industry from its very beginning.

That purpose always has been to produce, each season, the ruling sensible automobile value of the time.

Consider how clearly that purpose lays down the line of Overland endeavor.

That which is sensible must exclude cheapness on the one hand and extravagance on the other.

Sensible automobile value, while excluding both cheapness and extravagance, must include the essentials—performance, dependability, durability, comfort and good looks.

And ruling sensible automobile value must include these essentials in good round measure and for less money than they can be had in any other car.

Year after year for many years, public selection has proclaimed each successive Overland model the ruling sensible automobile value of its day.

So, the name Overland has come to mean exactly this clear and definite thing to the buying public.

And the more people know about automobiles the more they seek sensible value—as is shown in the big increase each year in the sale of Overland cars.

So the name Overland with its definite meaning has acquired enormous value.

This great and growing value of the Overland name makes brighter and brighter the guiding light of Overland purpose.

To make this definite meaning of the Overland name more and more apparent has become our greatest obligation.

No mere guarantee could ever be so binding.

This season the Model 90 Overland Thrift Car, true to Overland purpose, fulfills this obligation.

Over one hundred thousand purchasers have pronounced this car, in their judgment, the ruling sensible automobile value of the day.

Throughout the war period when automobiles were called upon for excessive service, when repair men were few, this Overland stood up and delivered with utmost dependability.

We offer it as the embodiment of Overland purpose—on its name and record, the ruling sensible automobile value today.

Overland dealers are receiving shipments in increasing quantities, but for some time to come the demand will probably exceed the supply.

If you intend purchasing a car this season, see the Overland dealer now.

which can throw wide the doors which seem to bar men from the treasure-house of Nature. Circumstances and environment follow the trend of mental progress. Growth follows knowledge. Action follows inspiration. Opportunity follows perception. Always the spiritual first, then the transformation into the infinite and illimitable possibilities of achievement. The persistent exercise of a few fundamental principles is the master-key by which the subtle and invisible forces of Faith and Desire are converted into actual, tangible, concrete conditions in the objective world.

My dear
Mr. Haanel:

I am enjoying the Master Key lessons very much. In fact they constitute the eatest source of real pleasure I have yet ex-rienced in this weary world.
They are the answer to a hunger and thirst have known all my life. "Blessed are they at do hunger and thirst after righteousness
r they shall be filled." The precious truths con-ined in these lessons seem to me the fulfill-ent of that promise. And possibly they are e "more light" that many believe to be now re.
From the first lessons the thought has been ith me constantly—surely this is "The Masr's teaching only stated in modern scientific rm, that we of this day and generation may nderstand.
You have solved the riddle of life and put it to language and form that all who so desire ay understand it.
It has always been difficult for me to express
y feelings on any subject, but knowing as I do at the reward a teacher prizes most highly is e responsive appreciation of his pupils, I felt must make an effort to let you know some-ing of what your worthy work means to me.
With best wishes for your welfare and a heart

Gratefully and sincerely yours,

Mr. Chas. F. Haanel,
St. Louis, Mo.

My dear Mr. Haanel:

Words are empty things unless the spirit is alive back of them and I wish mine to be few. I wish to show my appreciation in works.

"The Master-Key" has been most satisfying. Why? Because my intellect grasped it hungrily and my heart also was fed. Although the thought is deep, profound and metaphysical, it is expressed in such a lucid and masterful way that it was easy, fascinating, inspiring to learn.

Hitherto, when I thought I had found the lessons of worth, if my intellect was fed my heart would say, "Yes, that is all right as intellectual food, but of what use; there is no salvation in it."

"The Master Key" has not caused this unsatisfactory result, it appeals convincingly, unmistakably to every center of my being and is truth to me.

I am reminded of how Alexander carried about with him in a valuable box Homer's poems and in like spirit, I shall treasure the "Master Key."

Most sincerely yours,
Mrs. George S. Jenkins.

I have made a thorough examination of the little booklet which you so appreciatively have called the "Master-Key," and can unhesitatingly endorse it and its teachings.

In this pamphlet of only a few pages you have led a hungry world to the threshold and placed in their hands a "key" with which the understanding ones may unlock the door and enter "The Secret Places of the Most High," and enjoy the abundance of all good to be found therein. With best wishes,

"The Master-Key" is the answer to the demand "knock and it shall be opened," and truly it will open the "Gate Beautiful" leading into every "temple of the living God." All the world seek this marvelous key. Oh, ye who sit in darkness "Knock"—use this "Master-Key" and the door shall be opened unto you, revealing to your eyes of flesh, peace, power and plenty.

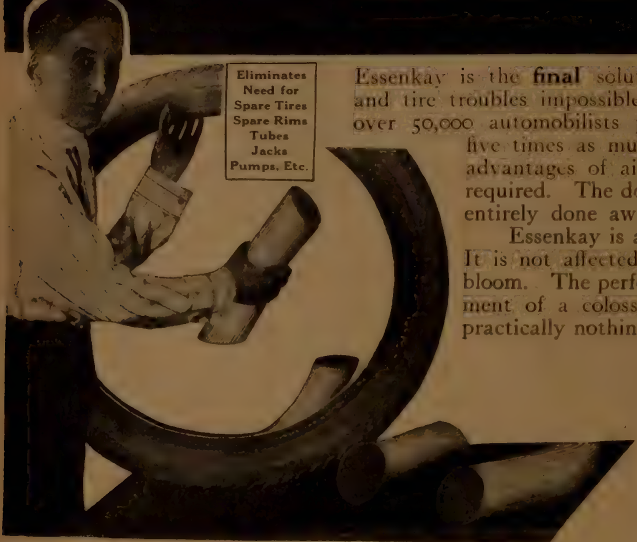
WILL HELP YOU The Master Key SOLVE YOUR PROBLEM

This advertisement contains a message of such transcendental importance, that every reader of the Christian Herald, whether man, woman or child, should answer it immediately.

No Punctures or Blowouts

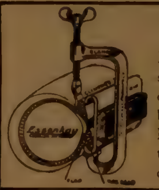


Eliminates Need for Spare Tires Spare Rims Tubes Jacks Pumps, Etc.

Essenkay is the final solution of the tire problem. It makes punctures, blowo and tire troubles impossible. No air is used, therefore no inner tubes. Its use over 50,000 automobilists proves it to be an economy in that it gives from two five times as much tire mileage as air; yet it rides like air and has all t advantages of air. No spare tires, spare rims, tubes, pumps or jacks a required. The delays, discomforts and expense incident to the use of air a entirely done away with.

Essenkay is a highly resilient, flexible material made by a secret proce It is not affected by heat, cold or pressure. It will not flatten, oxidize bloom. The perfection of Essenkay is a fitting climax to the magical develo ment of a colossal industry which in a few short years has grown fro practically nothing to one of the largest industries in the world.

"OVER 50,000 USERS"

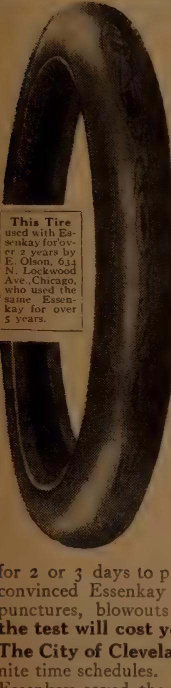


Installing Clamp

Illustration shows method of starting the bead of an Essenkay filled tire under clinch of rim.

Guarantee

Essenkay is guaranteed not to be affected by heat, cold, water, friction, atmospheric or climatic conditions;—not to flatten, not to crumble and not to change its consistency in any way.



This Tire used with Essenkay for over 2 years by E. Olson, 634 N. Lockwood Ave., Chicago, who used the same Essenkay for over 5 years.

Rides Like Air

Essenkay
A TIRE FILLER

Not A Liquid

Doubles Tire Mileage

Tires filled with Essenkay are kept at constant pressure, and cannot be run flat, thus they wear down to the last layer of fabric. The Victor Rubber Company of Michigan writes: "We will guarantee Victor-Springfield tires with Essenkay for 6000 miles. Victor tires apparently hold up better with Essenkay than with air, due probably to the fact that with the filler it is impossible to run them under inflated—under inflation is responsible for 90% of all tire trouble.

First Cost--Last Cost

Essenkay does not wear out like tires. It can be used over and over again. As tires wear down to the last layer of fabric and are discarded, the Essenkay may be taken out and transferred to new tires. Therefore Essenkay is an investment and not an expense. Many of our users have used the same Essenkay for over 5 years.

Mr. E. B. Rouse, 1636 Neal St., San Die Calif., drove this Ford from Chicago to S Diego, 3,483 speedometer miles. Tires filled wi Essenkay. "One of 50,000 users."

A Typical Testimonial

O. F. Weckwerth, Union, N. Y., writes under date of August 15th:—"I ask my friends as to the riding qualities of my car. The answer has always been 'easy.' When I tell them they are riding on Essenkay they are surprised. The verdict has always been that Essenkay rides as easily as air." This is only one of thousands of letters.

THESE TIRES FILLED WITH Essenkay

This Studebaker car was driven by Mr. J. D. Henning, 1436 E. Main St., Richmond, Va., 5,000 miles on a trans-continental tour without tire trouble. Tires filled with Essenkay, "One of 50,000 users."

10 DAYS' FREE TRIAL

To introduce Essenkay in territory where we have no dealers, we ship on 10 days' free trial. Test it under your own road and loading conditions. If your passenger car carries 5 people crowd in 8. If your truck carries a ton, put on 2 tons. Ride over smooth or rough roads including hilly or sandy country. Stand the car loaded on concrete floor for 2 or 3 days to prove that it will not flatten. Make any other test you see fit. If you are not convinced Essenkay rides like air, that it will double tire mileage, that you cannot be troubled by punctures, blowouts or slow leaks—that it will not flatten, crumble or deteriorate—send it back—the test will cost you nothing.

The City of Cleveland, Ohio—Department of Streets, use Essenkay for economy and to make definite time schedules. Mr. J. G. Tomson, Commissioner of Streets, made the statement that the use of Essenkay saved the City of Cleveland over $175,000.00 in 1917. A few of their cars shown below.

Prohibition's Day of Triumph

Forty States Ratify the Eighteenth Amendment which Writes Prohibition Into the Nation's Constitution

By FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

THE wheels of God's chariot have fairly flown recently, in victoriously riding down the forces of King Alcohol in this country. Today the whole nation arises and sings the ng-meter doxology, "Praise God from whom all essings flow," for their divine inspiration and idance in writing the prohibition of the liquor affic into the Constitution of the United States.

The nation is still surprised and dazed with the ddenness of the triumph. Yet a year ago the ristian Herald clearly foreshadowed that this com- g spring would witness the ratification by the legis- tures of the 36 states necessary, and since the ection last fall, this journal has expressed the belief at the month of January would settle the matter d give the nation relief from the unmitigated curse the liquor traffic.

On the 14th of January, Arkansas, Illinois, Indiana, ansas, North Carolina and Alabama were added the states ratifying, and on the next day, Iowa, olorado, Oregon, New Hampshire, and Utah joined em. On January 16, Nebraska ratified, making e 36th state necessary, and the last nail was driven John Barleycorn's coffin, the fight was over and rohibition was won forever. Other states kept ratifying. Missouri and Wyoming ratified a few ours after Nebraska, and Wisconsin and Michigan fol- wed on January 17: others were expected to follow.

There are many surprises for both friend and foe l along the line, but none greater than those of diana, Ohio and Illinois. These wealthy industrial ates, with large foreign population, have scattered the four winds the foolish argument of the liquor eople that this movement is simply one of the sage-rush or farming states undertaking to force national rohibition upon the rich industrial states. An ditorial in the New York Evening Post, in accounting r the success in Illinois, says that the German element Chicago, though strong, was not able to offset the de of prohibition against it, that many of the outhern people have made their homes in Chicago nd have carried with them their prohibition senti- ents and that more than half the state of Illinois ves in the farming districts and smaller cities.

The national resolution, which is short, is mighty, nd is as follows:

"Section 1. After one year from the ratification this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof nto, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"Section 2. The Congress and the several states shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"Section 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several states, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by Congress."

The resolution was adopted by the Senate August 1, 1917, 65 to 20; and by the House, December 17, 1917, 282 to 128. It was one of the greatest joys and glories of my life to have been present at the session of both Houses when the measure was adopted, and I felt that one of the greatest events in the moral history of the world had transpired and that our senators and representatives had measured up to the highest standard of American manhood and statesmanship in the manner in which they espoused and secured the passage of the bill.

According to the resolution, the liquor people will have a year from the time of the ratification of the amendment to clean up their traps and move out, but National War Prohibition will take effect on July 1, to remain during the demobilization of our troops, and good judges believe that National Prohibition ever and forever will practically begin July 1 next.

National Prohibition will not enforce itself. Stringent laws are being introduced into Congress with careful restrictions and heavy penalties. An imperial mandate of the people, which said to rum "Begone," will also say to the bootleggers, "You shall not, and if you attempt to break the law, we will put you behind the bars."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S marvelously swift promotion in public life began with his desperate fight against the law-breaking and crime-breeding saloons of New York City. His courage in that fight made him a national figure and a champion of moral reforms, and virtually made him President. In a recent letter to me he thus refers to that fight: "It has been my good fortune to be associated with you ever since the days when I was President of the Police Commission of New York, when I worked hand in hand with you, and with the Ministers' Association that you represented on behalf of temperance, and of doing away with the evil of the saloon power of New York City. At that time our fight was for a proper observance of the Sunday law. There could have been no more practical illustration of the hideous evil wrought by the liquor traffic than was afforded by the results of its stoppage for the few Sundays closed. During this period the usual mass of individuals up in the courts on Monday morning, on charges of being drunk and disorderly and committing assaults, diminished by two-thirds or over. The hospitals, such as Bellevue, showed a similar diminution of persons brought to them because of alcoholism and crimes due to drunkenness."

In speeches made during the wet and dry fight in Ohio, Colonel Roosevelt said if he lived in that state he would vote for prohibition. In urging National Prohibition as a war measure, Mr. Roosevelt said: "When we are threatened with a shortage of foodstuffs, when it is our duty to supply food to our Allies to our utmost ability, we should see that needed food necessities are not diverted from their proper use. Let us begin at once to see to it that our grain is kept for food, and not put into alcoholic beverages." He favored a National Constitutional Prohibition amendment. I sent him a copy of the first edition of my book, and received from him a letter written two days after the action of the House and one day after the action of the Senate concurring in the measure, expressing his gratification at the passage of the resolution and the fact that his life had run parallel with it to the goal. The letter is as follows:

"I thank you for your book and appreciate your sending it to me and I wish to congratulate you on what has happened in Congress and the success that is crowning your long fight against alcoholism. The American saloon has been one of the most mischievous elements in American social, political and industrial life. No man has warred more valiantly against it than you have, and I am glad that it has been my privilege to stand with you in the contest."

Since the receipt of that letter, dated December 19, 1917, I talked frequently with the Colonel on the subject, and he seemed to be as much pleased as the most enthusiastic temperance friends could be at the result and said that the badness of the business had destroyed itself as much as the moral courage, wisdom and persistency of those opposing it. He also said that the question of enforcing the law would be one of great importance, but that the people that had the votes to drive the business out could keep it out forever. He told me that he hoped to be of continued service to the cause when the problem of law enforcement came.

The premonition and assurance of the event. A café's publicity in wet New York

WHAT has brought about this National Prohibition? The present temperance upheaval is the revolt of the American conscience against what it considers to be wrong. The American saloon can blame itself largely for its extinction. It has been, from the start, essentially bad. Aside from the inherent danger of the business under the wisest possible restraints, the liquor dealers of the nation have done their worst to provoke alarm and opposition. The saloons are the breeding-places of all kinds of vice and crime. In them the thieves, murderers, ballot-box stuffers, grafters, purchasers of vice and the debauched find their education and protection, and from them the lawless hordes go forth to prey upon society. Public sentiment is outraged at the intimate relationship between the saloon and the disorderly house, the saloon and the gambling hell. Another thing that has stirred the public against the liquor traffic has been the relationship between the politician and the saloon. No feature of American public life is so abominable and discouraging as this notorious copartnership of the liquor traffic with the politicians of all parties in the business of crime.

It is not only the badness of the American saloon that has caused its destruction, but also the marked awakening of the public conscience against all kinds of wrong, and hence the saloon comes in for its share of rebukes and oppositions. The temperance reformers and organizations of the past and present have been exceedingly active, and each without exception has been an important factor in the great moral upheaval that has killed the liquor traffic. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Good Templars, the Third Party Prohibitionists, the National Reform Bureau, the Dry Federation, Church and other temperance societies, have all been active in their fields, but the one organization which has done more than all others, in giving wise direction and successful results to the present temperance resolution, has been the Anti-Saloon League, which was founded by Dr. Howard H. Russell at Oberlin, Ohio, in 1893, and of which Dr. Purley A. Baker is the National Superintendent.

IN THEIR delirium of enthusiasm at the ratification of the amendment by Illinois, the temperance workers rushed instinctively into the First Methodist Church of Chicago, and had a service of praise to God for their victory, and the whole audience arose and held out their right hands and pledged each other in God's sight, that they would carry this fight out into the nations of the earth for world-wide prohibition. And it was not an idle act of over-excited people, but the candid judgment that the thoughts embodied by the Anti-Saloon League of America in voting the saloon out by small units and larger ones would win everywhere as it has won in America, and that universal democracy would make room for universal prohibition, and universal prohibition would aid in universal democracy.

Lincoln, one of the greatest prophets of all the ages, in his speech at Springfield on the birthday of Washington, before he became prominent in American politics, thus fastens his eye on universal democracy and universal prohibition, and speaks to us today and to all the centuries, as follows:

"Turn now to the temperance revolution. In it we shall find a stronger bondage broken, a viler slavery manumitted; a greater tyranny deposed. In it more of want supplied, more disease healed, more sorrow assuaged. By it no orphans starving, no widows weeping. By it none wounded in feeling, none injured in interest. Even the dram-maker and the dram-seller will have glided into other occupations so gradually as never to have felt the shock of change; and will stand ready to join all others in the song of universal gladness. And what a noble ally thi to the cause of political freedom! With such an its march cannot fail to be on and on, until ev son on earth shall drink in rich fruition the sor quenching draughts of perfect liberty. Happy when, all appetites controlled, all passions subdu all manners subjected, mind, all conquering mi shall live and move the monarch of the wo Glorious consummation! Hail, fall of Fury! of Re Reason, all hail! And when the victory shall complete—when there sh be neither a slave nor drunkard on earth — h proud the title of that la which may truly claim to the birthplace and the cra of both of those revoluti that shall have ended in th victory! How nobly dist guished that people who sh have planted and nurtured maturity both the politi and moral freedom of t species!"

WE RECALL here piece of temperan history in Illinois, which cludes Mr. Lincoln's act fight for state-wide prohi tion in that state abou years ago. In a personal terview my informant sai

"The fight was conduc by the Illinois State Mai Law Alliance, and it w under the auspices of th association as secretary t I went into the campaign which I had Lincoln as m strong right arm. I got Li coln to write the prohibito bill that was to be voted upo After he had drafted it, said: 'There, I think it hold water, but what I w to know is whether it will hold whiskey, and he s me to a number of fine lawyers to get their opin on it. He made at least thirty addresses for in the campaign, and was the most powerful a popular speaker we had. Lincoln was so deep interested in the fight that he helped me raise mon for it. In fact, it was through his personal influen mostly that the funds necessary for carrying the campaign were raised. Mr. William B. Ogde then president of the Chicago and Northweste Railroad and a man of tremendous influence, wh was deeply interested in the fight for no-license the state, asked me to bring Mr. Lincoln into h office for a conference as to the most efficient metho of carrying on the contest. I took Mr. Lincoln in his office and we entered seriously and heartily in the discussion of the problem, at the close of wh Mr. Ogden wrote out his personal check for $2,50 and handing it to Mr. Lincoln said: 'If you ne more, come back to me. I will duplicate that che cheerfully.' In that early period we came with 15,000 votes in a popular election of carrying Illinois.

Who knows how deep Lincoln's influence was, an whether it may not have reached to the present tim in helping to solve the great problem of ratificatio

How Prohibition Will Be Enforced

ON JANUARY 16 the United States was made a bone-dry nation by the vote of the legislature of Nebraska, which made up the thirty-six states necessary to the ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution. Later in the day two more states, Wyoming and Missouri, ratified the amendment. On January 17, ten states remained which had not voted to banish the saloon. Connecticut, Minnesota, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont and Wisconsin. Most of these states are expected to fall into line and may do so before this issue reaches our readers.

There are twenty-five prohibition organizations in the United States, and they have already agreed on the main provisions of an act by which Congress will be asked to enforce the amendment.

Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler, general counsel of the Anti-Saloon League, gave to a representative of the New York Times the meaning of the ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment, as viewed by the prohibitionists. He pointed out that the war-time prohibition, commencing July 1 next, would run into constitutional prohibition.

"When Secretary Lansing proclaims the ratification of the amendment," said Mr. Wheeler, "it will mean that: The Federal amendment becomes operative one year from that date. Congress is given notice it is its duty to enact a Federal prohibition law. The wet states are also notified to enact prohibition laws in harmony with the Federal amendment. The dry states will retain and strengthen their laws if needed. No license laws for beverage use of liquor can thereafter be enacted or enforced. The Federal and state authorities will have concurrent power to enact and enforce laws within their respective jurisdictions. Congress will have power to enact laws in the nature of police regulations to make prohibition effective."

In New York State bills will be introduced into the Assembly and Senate under which enforcement would be vested in a Prohibition Commissioner, who would enforce prohibition and control the manufacture and sale of alcohol for mechanical and medicinal purposes, and of wine for sacramental purposes. The bill would compel any one arrested for intoxication to tell where he got the liquor, under penalty of a fine of $75 to $100. No sale would be made for medicinal purposes except by prescription, and an affidavit would be required of all persons buying alcohol for scientific or sacramental purposes. Licenses to sell alcohol or wine would be issued only to druggists of approved standing, and could not represent more than one per cent. of the value of all the goods on sale in a store.

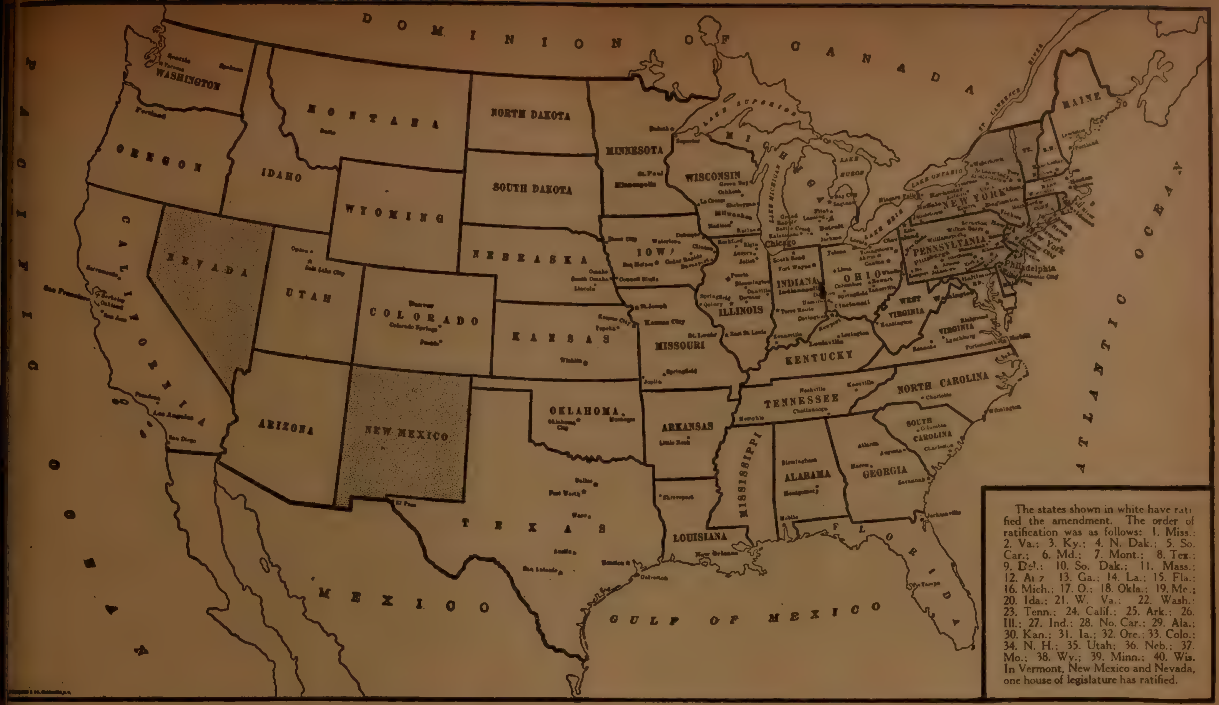
The sale of all extracts and patent medicines, which are now manufactured under a United States liquor tax, would be prohibited. None but a licensed druggist could sell certain proprietary and patent preparations named, and then only on prescription of a licensed physician.

All advertising of liquors would be prohibited by a section which reads as follows: "Any advertisement or notice containing the p ture of a brewery, distiller bottle, keg, barrel, or bo or other receptacle, repr sented as containing intoxicating liquors or designat to serve as an advertisement thereof, shall be with the inhibition of this section."

New York State will lose considerable revenue fro national prohibition. The revenue for the ye ending September 30, 1918, was $22,616,442.7 being $1,868,934.21 more than for 1917.

The liquor interests are hurrying to unload t liquor now held in storage in the United State and for this purpose have planned an export concer to be known as the Transoceanic Commercial Co poration, which is incorporated in New York with capital of $1,000,000. It is estimated that there a about 100,000,000 gallons of distilled spirits storage in the United States.

It has been pointed out that those persons wh have provided against a period of aridity by laying in a store of liquor are only laying up troubles fo themselves, as the amendment prohibits not only the manufacture and sale, but the transportation o intoxicating liquors. An editorial writer in the New York Times points out that "the very kindliest of courts could hardly fail to decide that the moving of liquids, in any degree intoxicating, from one house to another came under the ban. So they who are now filling their cellars with the products of distillation, fermentation or malting must abandon their treasure if ever they make a change of residence. The alternative is never to move, and, to the typical American, the right to make periodic movings is among his most valued liberties."



The states shown in white have rati fied the amendment. The order of ratification was as follows: 1. Miss.: 2. Va.; 3. Ky.; 4. N. Dak.; 5. So. Car.; 6. Md.; 7. Mont.; 8. Tex.; 9. Del.: 10. So. Dak.; 11. Mass.; 12. Ariz 13. Ga.; 14. La.; 15. Fla.; 16. Mich.; 17. O.; 18. Okla.; 19. Me.; 20. Ida.; 21. W. Va.: 22. Wash.: 23. Tenn.; 24. Calif.; 25. Ark.: 26. Ill.; 27. Ind.: 28. No. Car.; 29. Ala.; 30. Kan.; 31. Ia.; 32. Ore.: 33. Colo.; 34. N. H.; 35. Utah; 36. Neb.; 37. Mo.; 38. Wy.; 39. Minn.; 40. Wis. In Vermont, New Mexico and Nevada, one house of legislature has ratified.

Opening of the Peace Conference

AT THREE minutes past three P. M., on January eighteenth, the anniversary of the proclamation of the German Empire at Versailles, President Poincaré of France called order the first formal meeting of the Interallied ace Conference, which is to rewrite the charter of world's liberties. President Wilson arrived at minutes before three, and the President of France three o'clock. President Poincaré welcomed the egates, speaking in French. The delegates were ted at a table arranged in the form of a horseshoe h places for the nine premiers, including the preing premier, and for sixty other delegates. The eting was in the former "Salle de Horloge" in the ench Foreign office, now christened the "Salle de Paix." A great marble of figure of Peace, holding ft the torch of civilization, guards the council ble of the nations.

In opening the conference President Poincaré exessed the pleasure of France in the choice of her pital—"the city which for more than four years the emy made his principal military objective"—as e seat of the labors of the conference. He outlined lingly the sufferings and sacrifices of France in the mmon cause and declared that Germany's guilt s clearly shown saying, "the truth bathed in blood s already escaped from the imperial archives." He en took up, one by one, the causes which led the rious Allies into the contest with Prussian militrism, showing that the delegates gathered in Paris r the conference represented the free peoples of the rld, drawn together by the indignation aroused by e war-making methods of the Central Empires. He ve full credit to America, both for her high purpose d her contribution to the final victory, and for "the fty moral and political truth of which President ilson has nobly made himself the interpreter." nd he declared that the delegates were met to adinister justice and that "Justice banishes the dream conquest and imperialism." He included the eation of the League of Nations among the accomishments to be expected of the Conference, and d, in closing, "You are assembled in order to repair e evil that has been done and to prevent a recurnce of it. You hold in your hands the future of the orld." M. Poincaré then withdrew.

In accordance with plans previously made, President ilson at once arose to propose Premier Clemenceau permanent Chairman of the Conference. He eclared that he did this as a tribute to the French epublic and also as a tribute to the man. He said, It is a very delightful thought that the history of the orld, which has so often centered here, will now be owned by the achievements of this conference—ecause there is a sense in which this is the supreme conference of the history of mankind. . . . The fortunes of all peoples are involved. A great war is ended. . . . the danger is passed. A victory has been won for mankind." The President expressed his delight in being able to honor France in the person of so distinguished a servant and he paid an eloquent tribute to the leadership and brotherhood of Premier Clemenceau who, he said, "Feels as we feel, as I have no doubt everybody in this room feels, that we are trusted to do a great thing, to do it in the highest spirit of friendship and accommodation, and to do it as promptly as possible in order that the hearts of men may have fear lifted from them, and that they may return to those purposes of life which bring them happiness and contentment and prosperity."

Premier Lloyd George and Baron Sonnino seconded the nomination.

PREMIER CLEMENCEAU, in accepting the chair, declared himself deeply touched by the expressions of friendship on the part of the speakers. He said that President Wilson had spoken truly in saying that the delegates represented all the civilized nations of the world and continued, "I wish to repeat here that success is not possible unless we remain firmly united. We have come together as friends, we must leave this hall as friends. That, gentlemen, is the first thought that comes to me. All else must be subordinated to the necessity for a closer and closer union among the nations who have taken part in this great war, and to the necessity of remaining friends. For the League of Nations is here. It is yourself."

In closing he said, "The program of this conference has been laid down by President Wilson. It is no longer the peace of a more or less vast territory, no longer the peace of continents; it is the peace of nations that is to be made. The program is sufficient in itself. There is no superfluous word. Let us try to act swiftly and well."

Premier Clemenceau then announced that the League of Nations would be placed at the head of the "order of the day" at the next full session of the Conference and the sitting adjourned at 4:30 P.M. It was provided in the rules adopted in the Conference that the twenty-five representatives of the Five Great Powers, Great Britain, France, the United States, Italy and Japan, should take part in all meetings and commissions, outlining the elements of the peace settlement, and that the smaller groups would then have an opportunity to discuss and amend them, and would take part only in discussions concerning their interests, time being saved by this method. The questions of responsibility for the war, and of international adjustment of labor problems, were prominent in the announced program.

Germany, at least the Ebert government, was reported on January 17 to have appointed as her delegates to the Peace Congress, Philip Scheidemann, Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau, former minister to Denmark, Prince Lichnowsky, former Ambassador to England (whose revelations of German guilt made him an exile), Count George Arco and one Socialist, Karl Kautsky. This delegation was said to have been instructed to accept no peace terms at variance with President Wilson's fourteen points; and to demand the return of the German colonies.

THE preliminary conferences between President Wilson and the other national leaders in Paris continued through the week of January 12. There were ready forty separate plans for the organization of a League of Nations which had been prepared to be submitted to the Conference. One of the first acts of the Conference, it was said, would be the appointment of a committee to work out from among these many suggestions a single feasible program.

The standard of representation of the Conference was fixed on January 10, and it was announced in an official communiqué, issued for the sitting of that day, that the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy and Japan were to have five delegates apiece; Great Britain's dominions, two delegates each, for Australia, Canada, South Africa and India, and one for New Zealand; Brazil and Belgium, three delegates; China, Greece, Poland, Portugal, the Czecho-Slovak Republic, Rumania and Serbia, two each; Siam, Cuba, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Liberia, Nicaragua and Panama, one delegate each. Montenegro will probably have one delegate. Each delegation will vote in the Conference as a unit, and it was reported that it had been agreed that all decisions of the Congress must be unanimous. Developments of the 15th made a considerable stir in Paris among the British and American press correspondents, it being reported that in spite of the President's declaration in his 14 points for open covenants of peace openly arrived it, the French, Italian and Japanese delegates had prevailed over the American and British, and had voted to have all the proceedings secret and the publicity confined to the official communiqués to be issued at the close of each day. President Wilson and Premier Lloyd George were reported to have received resolutions of protest from the press representatives against this action. On January 16 the protest brought a reconsideration on the publicity question, and on January 17 it was announced that arrangements had been made to admit representatives of the press to the sessions of the Peace Conference, but that the Conference would retain the right to hold executive sessions.

A DOZEN persons were killed and 50 injured in Boston on January 15 by the explosion of a huge tank of molasses on the waterfront. Buildings were destroyed and two pillars of the Boston Elevated Railroad were knocked from under the structure, while wagons, carts and motor trucks in the streets nearby were overturned and a number of horses were killed. Rescue parties are here shown searching the ruins of one of the buildings which collapsed. The molasses was ankle deep in the streets.

THE last Spartacus stronghold, the Boetzow Brewery, which had been heavily armed and garrisoned, fell before the artillery of the government troops in Berlin on January 12. Liebknecht and former Chief of Police, Herr Eichhorn, fled the city. While Berlin was in turmoil, the rest of the country was carrying on elections for the National Assembly, and in these elections the Independent Socialists and Spartacides were uniformly defeated. The soldiers used against the Reds in Berlin were part of the force of veterans which had been enlisted to defend the eastern frontiers against the Poles and to retake Posen. It was announced from Coblenz, on January 15, that there were on that date still in the German army in the neighborhood of 1,250,000 men. Hindenburg was reported to rely upon the officers as a force to restore order in Germany.

Herr Ebert declared on January 15 that the Government was in complete control in Berlin. On January 15 a draft of a constitution had been completed which provided for the election of a President by direct vote of the people, to serve for ten years, with a union of fifteen states on the American principle, state boundaries being so arranged that each would include a population of 2,000,000 or over. Eight states were to be made out of the former Kingdom of Prussia, five out of the other German states and two out of German Austria and Vienna.

Karl Liebknecht and his coworker, Rosa Luxemburg, authors of the week of terror in Berlin, came to a violent death on January 15. It became known that they were at the Hotel Eden, in the western part of the city. A crowd rapidly congregated and stormed the hotel. The troops on guard spirited the two Spartacide leaders out by a side entrance. The guards got away with Liebknecht in an automobile, but the mob got hold of Miss Luxemburg and beat her into insensibility, before she could be placed in an automobile to be taken to prison. The automobile in which Liebknecht was riding suffered a punctured tire. The officers asked Liebknecht, who had been wounded in escaping from the hotel, if he could walk to the next street. He assented, and in passing a group of trees he attempted to escape. The guards fired, and he was instantly killed. While his aide—the Luxemburg woman—was being taken unconscious in an automobile to prison, a man jumped on the running board and shot her through the head. The crowd then seized the body, and, it was said, threw it into the canal. The Ebert government announced that the officers responsible for permitting the events of the 15th to occur would be severely punished.

Liebknecht had been in German politics for twenty-five years, fighting constantly for the Socialist International and the triumph of the workers. He opposed the war and was expelled by his party in 1915 for putting internationalism above patriotism. As a member of the Reichstag he was a constant thorn in the side of the Government and was finally imprisoned, being freed in the first week of November. Miss Luxemburg was born in Russia Poland, December 25, 1870, and was considered the real strength of the Spartacus movement. She had been a radical Socialist for many years. She was called the Socialist party's "enfante terrible," and since 1901 had been repeatedly fined and imprisoned for various offenses. The Spartacus adherents were reported on January 16 to be in control in Bremen, Cuxhaven and Düsseldorf, while the Brunswick republic, whose President was Morges, a tailor, was said to be in open rebellion against the Ebert government. The elections of Jan. 19, whlie marked by serious rioting, were carried by the conservative parties.

COALITION MINISTRY IN POLAND. After weeks of arduous labor in harmonizing the differences of contending factions, Ignace Paderewski succeeded, on January 19, in forming a coalition ministry and establishing a government in Warsaw to succeed the military dictatorship of Gen. Pilsudski. The new government hoped to bring to a peaceful settlement all the questions existing between Poland, the Ukraine and Lithuania.

HIGHER FREIGHT RATES. It was announced through Washington on January 19 that the increase in wages granted by the railway administration would result in an extra cost of railway operation during 1919 of from $900,000,000 to $1,000,000,000, and that the railways would face a deficit of about $250,000,000 by the end of the year. It was predicted that the Director General would be forced to seek a further rise in freight rates.

TO BRING THE BOYS HOME. The German merchant fleet, turned over to the Allies, adds to the tonnage now in service a total of 2,300,000 tons of cargo ships and 700,000 tons of passenger ships. The largest of these, including the Imperator, will be turned over to the American government and will increase the capacity of ships to bring the men home by 70,000 men a month. The British will take the smaller ships for the Australia and New Zealand trade via the Suez Canal.

TO HONOR ROOSEVELT. The National Congress has set aside February 9 as a day to honor former President Roosevelt and to express the deep debt of the Nation to him and its deeper sorrow at his death. As this was written a movement was rapidly gaining headway looking to the nationwide observance of this day.

THE VICTORY LOAN. Secretary of the Treasury Glass announced on January 16 that the next war loan will be called the Victory Liberty Loan and that the honor flag would bear a blue "V" on a white field surrounded by a red border, the "V" indicating both 5 and victory. The exact date when the loan will be offered has not been decided nor is the amount determined, although it was announced that this loan, which would be the last offered in a nationwide campaign, would be for $5,000,000,000 to $6,000,000,000.

FOCH WOULD HOLD RHINE. In an interview on January 15 at Treves, where the Armistice Commissions met to extend that arrangement, Marshal Foch declared that the Rhine should henceforth be the outer bulwark of civilization against German aggression. His statement was taken to mean, not that the German Rhineland should be added to France, but that Germ should be forbidden to f tify it or to accumulate mu tions there. In the same in view he paid a hearty trib to the American troo Asked if the armistice not concluded too soon, Marshal answered: "Do less any general would h preferred to have contin the struggle and to battle when the battle wh offered itself was so promis but a father of a family c not help but think of blood that would be s A victory, however easy, co the lives of men. We h victory in our grasp with any further sacrifice. took it as it came."

RELIEF SHIPS SAIL. Two steamships sailed from New York on January 16 with supplies for the people o Asia Minor. The ships were the United States transports Mercurius and Western Belle. The two ships together carried $3,500,000 worth of food and supplies provided by the American Committee for Relief in the Near East (Armenia and Syria) and the Jewish War Sufferers Committee. Five relief workers sailed on the Mercurius. It was announced on January 16 that the British and United States Governments had taken emergency action fo the relief of famine conditions i Rumania. The British are feeding, in a camp near Bagdad, 45,000 Armenian and Syrian refugees.

BRITISH ENGINEERS MAKING WA FOR TRADE. London dispatches o January 15 reported that improvements in the channel of the Shat el Arab, the river formed by the confluence of the Euphrates and Tigris Rivers, had made it possible for ocean steamers to go up the river from the gulf to a point 20 miles above Busra. By opening an old canal northeast of Bagdad the British engineers have provided irrigation for 300,000 acres.

ENGLAND'S DEATH LIST. The German air and sea raids on England during the war caused the death and injury of 5,411 persons of whom 4,750 were civilians. 1,270 persons were killed; 554 men, 411 women and 295 children. 498 of the civilians were killed by Zeppelins, 619 by airplane raids and 143 by bombardments from the sea.

True Love Triumphant

N A ward of the base hospital at Jouy, France, a nurse placed an invalid-table across the bed of a patient that he might write a letter. She laid the paraphernalia of correspondence on it, with untain-pen in reach of the sick man's hand, and, ing away, she covertly watched him with an anx- that was ominous.

ieutenant Meade reached his right hand forward, took up the pen. Then his left shoulder twitched oluntarily in a motion which would have made that and hand move toward the writing-paper on the le—if there had been an arm and hand there to ve. But there was only a swath of bandages to k his left arm's severance from his body, and the ng man's immediate consciousness of his forgetful- s made him grasp with his right hand at the paper, ch was now ing from the le from the of his futile rt. In the ertainty of new help- sness, the ntain-pen ped from fingers, and ling down side of the , it fell clat- ingly to the r.

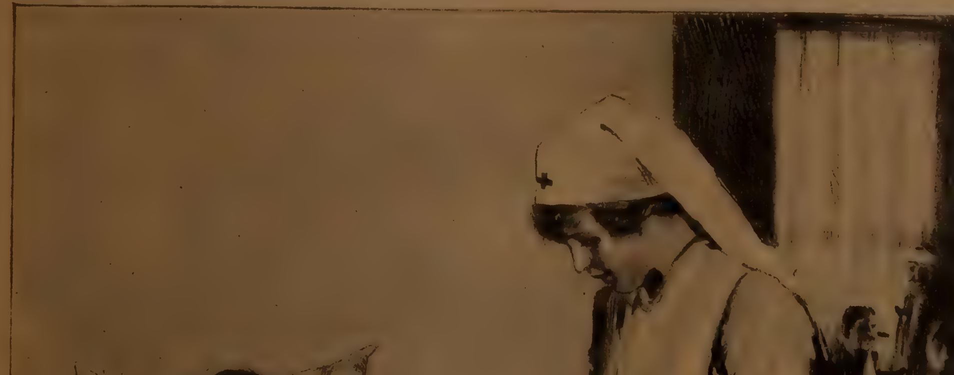
There was a ck change in nurse's de- anor as she tored order the im- mptu desk. r patient s now watch- her with a adfastness t was gaug- his chances the future the light of r under- nding of his kwardness, d she substi- ted profes- nal cheer- lness for mpathy.

"Like the lit- girl in the em, you must y again,'' e encouraged n lightly.

"Doubtless l keep on try- g. There will t be much e for me to ," the young an responded imly.

RIMNESS did not find cordial set- g on Lieu- nant Meade's atures. The old of his merican face, th its quick- ening gray es, and its alert, frank, free sensitiveness to impres- ons, rejected the doleful even in the recognition of s own tragedy. His was a face markedly stamped ith the normal promise of hope and happiness to the ung. A sick man propped up in bed with pillows, ere was about him an unusual vitality, a circum- ance which made the somber shadow settling on his atures from his words the more incongruous. It was his quick-opening eyes that this shadow found a ding-place, that was subtly betrayed by a narrowing sion, which to the trained gaze of the nurse was metimes the presage to a dark, grim life.

As the nurse moved away, Richard Meade resumed e business of letter-writing by determinedly grasping e pen and leaning back against the pillows with ght unseeingly introspective. And in his eyes, now de open, and still youthful despite the harrowing nowledge of ruthless warfare from which he had tely emerged, there was the danger the nurse had en for all to see.



"How I have loved you! * * * Now—I am at my journey's end," he wrote

To those young eyes, gas and a shrapnel wound had done their cruel work. This the young man knew, as he planned his letter. He also knew that this writing of, what was to him a tragic message would enact the last volition of his sight. When his letter was finished, his eyes were to be shrouded from the light of day, that their nerves might rest before an operation, for the result of which he was given no promise of perfect sight. That there was a chance for the surgeon's victory was the one hopeful thing, he was told. If he refused to take this chance, he would be blind.

It was this knowledge that made him search for the right words for his letter; however, there seemed to be no language fitted for the anguish he knew he could not conceal in it. It was when weariness from long reflection seized him that he made a beginning by addressing an envelope to Miss Eloise Hibbard, Armsdale-on-the-Hudson, New York, U. S. A., and gazing at it with smiling tenderness. But in a moment the smile was gone, leaving a sad gravity, as his uncertain handwriting filled the pages before him with these words:

"ELOISE, MY OWN DEAR GIRL: I have something to say to you which I must say tersely, lest I lose the courage to say it at all. So bear with the shock of this letter, so different from those I wrote you in hope and happiness. Bear with its faltering phrases, keeping well in mind as you read that every word I write you is charged with a love so supreme that for you it can sacrifice its own beatitude.

"Long before this letter reaches you, you will have seen my name among the severely wounded in the army lists. At once, I must tell you that it is the seriousness of my affliction that has delayed my writing to you. It was because I knew all too soon the nature of my cross that I refrained from grieving you with details. Now I tell you, because I must.

"I have lost my left arm; it was shot away at the shoulder. Before this happened, I had been gassed, and after being in the hospital for a few weeks was returned to the front. But the gas had injured my eyes, and while in the fight on the Marne I received a shrapnel wound in the head which increased the damage to my sight. This is my worst affliction, for I have only a chance of saving my vision through an operation which is to take place in America when I am invalided home.

"What I have written is the truth, you must realize. I am to be permanently a cripple, and may be blind.

"Therefore, in words which I vainly seek to make less harsh, I give you back your promise, and ask you to sever the engagement into which we entered with such high hope. Remembering that you pledged your faith to a man with life's reasonable assurance before him, I cannot in honor keep you bound to a sightless cripple. And lest, in hearing your beloved voice, I should lose the courage which has made me write this letter, and perhaps plead for the mercy of your loving heart, I am determined never to meet you again.

"So bid me farewell without a response which would only add to my anguish. They tell me my heart pumps strong, and that I shall be a healthy cripple. Well—so be it. An arm and a pair of eyes are not too much to give to a great country and a great cause. If love must go with them, I shall do my best 'to carry on,' as they say over here.

"I shall be sadly consoled by the thought that once I had your love. The only weakness I allow myself are these last words I write you. I have loved you, O My Own Dear Girl. How I have loved you! How I shall always love you! As for the rest of my life—now—I am at my journey's end. RICHARD MEADE."

WITH the letter ended, the nurse came, and closed the light of day from Richard Meade. When she had finished her ministrations, the gray shadow of despair had come forth from its hiding-place to spread its phantom misery over the young man's features, aging them with the deadening apathy of self-sacrifice.

Then, because his days were dark, he began to live over his past, picturing the happiness of his engagement to Eloise Hibbard. He had always marveled at Eloise's gentle strength, which had withstood the force of strong maternal disapproval, accepting him with only his modest fortune, instead of the wealthier suitors favored by her mother. When Mrs. Hibbard demanded obedience from her daughter, he remembered with astonishment that Eloise had at once summoned him to face her family with her, and announced her intention to marry him.

The sweet-fraught days of their engagement passed on full with their planning for the future. There were the hours when they decided on the purchase of an old red brick house on an obscure road near Eloise's home. There were several occasions when they hurried from room to room in it, viewing its quaint-angled rooms and lofty ceilings with the pride of future ownership. There was the discovery of the old dust-covered mahogany furniture in the attic. There had been their rapturous gazing at a weather-beaten sign "For Sale" which they found on a post near the road. Afterward there was a harrowed waiting until he found the aged owner of the house, and knew its price to be within their means.

JUST then war had been declared, with his immediate enlistment and training at the first officer's camp. This had made them decide to marry at once, and they had even obtained a marriage license. But the determined opposition of Eloise's mother to a hasty wedding and parting was strong enough to influence them, and they had agreed to wait—until he came home. For in his vision of the future there had been two things—he might give his life for his country, or he might be spared that sacrifice. For what had come to him, he made no plan.

In the weeks he rested on his pillows in darkness, he knew his letter was speeding its way to Eloise Hibbard. On its arrival, he could hear Eloise's mother voicing stereotyped phrases of regret to cover her satisfaction and relief. She would speak of "his misfortune," and counsel resignation. If Eloise grieved—and, alas! he knew she would—there would be her mother to suggest the acceptance of Fate's decrees. This time Mrs. Hibbard's advice was as his own, and this time he was not there for Eloise to summon. Fate had indeed taken the matter out of their hands. The Three Sisters were now transcribing a bold script on war and nations, and hearts and sentiment equaled but the periods on their pages.

WHEN his hospital days were over, there was still the homeward trip on the steamer to endure. It called for stoical endurance to pass the long days at sea with bandaged eyes and a crippled body, and not to despair. Before leaving France he had cabled the date of his arrival to his friend John Meredith, asking him to meet him at the steamer. On his long way home, he knew this meeting would be a bitter experience. To be obliged to depend on another man for guidance, to be led to some hotel, and there to be left to adjust his shattered life—this was before him. Renunciation of many things was to be his portion, and on the day he stood near the steamer's rail, hearing his fellow passengers acclaim the sight of their native land, he grievingly bowed his bandaged head.

It was good, however, to find John Meredith awaiting him, and to feel the firm, strong hand of friendship guide him through the crowds about the dock. And it was necessary, also, as the young officer found, for he was stopped many times on his slow passage by strangers who shook hands with him, and expressed their appreciation of his service for them. These tributes were so unexpected and so numerous that Richard Meade was half bewildered when he reached his cab.

"Do they always do that?" he asked his friend wonderingly, as they settled for their ride.

"Most always, when a soldier is badly battered. Why, hang it, old man, you know we appreciate your sacrifice over here," explained Meredith with a rough huskiness in his voice.

FOR some time this point of view occupied the young men's attention. Indeed, John Meredith appeared to want to make the most of any topic they discussed as they rode onward. To Richard it soon became apparent that his friend was enlarging on vague subjects of discussion to avoid speaking of his affliction. But at last John Meredith's strange volubility could not cover the length of time they were remaining in the cab. For, on and on the young men rode, reaching no destination, until the young officer's curiosity was aroused. It was after they had rolled along a smooth road for many miles that he asked impatiently:

"Where in the world are you taking me, Meredith?"

"To a place in the country. I thought the country would be best for you for a while after your trip," answered Meredith, as their cab swung suddenly around a gravel circle, and stopped.

THE gentle peace of the uncrowded spaces of the country surrounded Richard Meade as Meredith helped him to alight. This was all the wounded soldier was conscious of as he waited for his friend to lead him forward. For the rustle of the wind in the trees was the only sound about him as guided by John Meredith, he climbed a few stone steps and entered a doorway.

"How still it is, John! Is there no one here?" he asked wonderingly as the crunch of the wheels of the departing taxi sounded in the silence.

"There are plenty of people here. You will meet them shortly," Meredith informed him, guiding him quickly on through a hallway, and then abruptly turning him through an open doorway.

Richard Meade had but stepped into this room when he heard the door close behind him, and he knew that Meredith had left him.

For a moment he stood in the helpless uncertainty of those without sight. Then, annoyed at what he considered an unseeming trifling with his affliction, he called out:

"Come back, Meredith. Where am I?"

HIS voice died away in the profound stillness of the place, and there came to Richard Meade the startling conviction that he was not alone. From the other side of the room he could hear some one moving toward him; suddenly there was a light rustle of rich raiment, and a form stood near him. A bitter wave of despair was sweeping over him that he could not see, when he heard a voice say brokenly:

"Beloved, you are in the red brick house."

"Eloise!" he cried. All the darkness of bandaged vision, all his sense of helplessness went from him in the wonder that she was near him. His right arm moved uncertainly in the direction of her voice, and the girl came quickly to its summons, taking his hand in hers, and meeting his lips in their long, silent embrace. Richard Meade could only find terms of endearment to murmur to her, and it was when Eloise said joyfully: "I knew you would come back to me," that he remembered his resolution.

"Why have you done this, Eloise?" he protested sadly.

"Because I love you," she answered.

"Why have you come to me and made our renu tion harder?" he repeated firmly.

"I have not renounced you," the girl said resolu

"You must renounce me," he commanded. " must not cheat yourself through pity."

"You must not cheat me of your love."

THEY had moved apart, and he could not see her eyes were deep with love as she saw his less sleeve and bandaged eyes.

"When I read your letter, I knew I could not you up," she began,

"I know what you would say," he interrupted "It is false reasoning, and I must not listen to it."

There was a brief silence between them. Richard Meade did not know that in it Eloise Hibb faced him with clear, sane eyes, and saw again, fully, the extent of his affliction, and its consequen But on her face there was no dismay. Instea flaming lovelight leaped to her eyes and burned d to a vivid crimson on her cheeks. Love had flung a challenge, daring her to accept overwhelming o and in the beauty of her perfect youth, straight-lim and supple in her shimmering gown, all-glowing w the ease of a life that has never known a care, responded gallantly. Reaching her arms out wide defiance, she negated the odds against her, in yearning passion of her love for the maimed and h less man before her. When she spoke hurriedly her voice exulted her power and certainty:

"John Meredith advanced the money with whic bought this house, Richard, and Mrs. Meredith, J and I furnished it together. John brought you h for he is to be your best man. The minister and guests await us in the next room. We are in our o dear red brick house; and, dearest—we are to married today."

HE WAS engulfed in the volume of her love, it was with an aching heart that he forced self to say:

"I will not let you mate with a cripple."

"I shall mate with one whom all men honor."

"I shall be poor——"

"We will be poor together."

"But—you must know—there is a doubt of ever seeing again."

"I do not need to know. I love you."

She came close to him, and placed his hand on shoulder.

"My love, I wear my wedding-gown that your de eyes may not see. It is white and lustrous, and ov my bridal veil sweeps to my feet. I am your bri arrayed as gorgeously for you as if you could see For if you are to be blind, I shall love you, and becau you are a cripple, I but love you the more. For lov the need of the heart to spend itself on its beloved, the greater the need of its service, the greater and more wonderful does love become. Oh, Richard, you take this glory from me?"

AS SHE spoke, Richard Meade folded the satin-cl form reverently to him. From his face the li of care, and age, and apathy were vanishing mira lously. A light greater than earthly sight was mak him see the vision of a love that rose above tempo disabilities to the heights of eternal perfection. Wh Eloise Hibbard's head touched his shoulder, he capi lated.

"At my journey's end I have found a divine lov he whispered.

We Will Save Democracy With Food

The War Garden Army Is Called to the Service of Peace. By LEWIS EDWIN THEISS

NECESSITY is the mother of far more than invention. For one thing, Necessity has created in America an incredibly large army of gardeners. Starting from a mere nothing, this garden army has grown in two years to a force far larger than we raised or planned to raise for the trenches. The National War Garden Commission, after a careful survey in the fall of 1918, puts the minimum number of American war gardens at 5,285,000. As a matter of fact this is so conservative an estimate that it falls short of the truth. The United States Department of Agriculture believes that the number of American war gardeners in 1918 was almost double that number. It is immaterial what the exact number was. The point is that, if we could really understand and appreciate the part that American gardens are playing in this great struggle for democracy—for it is by no means ended as yet—the number of American gardeners, large though that number be, would increase tremendously.

Accustomed to thinking of things in the large, we Americans before the war had come to despise the day of small things, including backyard gardening. We regarded it as not worth while, or beneath us, or too bothersome. And, in our typically extravagant American fashion, we preferred to buy stale vegetables that somebody else had raised, rather than grow fresh ones for ourselves. It is said of Necessity, also, that she knows no law. But in creating this vast army of American gardeners, Necessity was acting in accordance with the first law of nature. For without gardens we Americans would have been hard put to it to solve the problem of self-preservation. To most of us gardening is still merely a way of getting some of our food cheaply. Most of us do not yet grasp the fact that American gardens alone make it possible for some of us to have food, or at least all the food we need, and that American gardens played an almost decisive part in the winning of the war.

Even when our allies produced maximum food crops they could not feed themselves. The United States Food Administration is authority for the statement that before the war England raised not more than one-fourth of her food, France perhaps one-half of what she ate and Italy not more than two-thirds of her food. Before August, 1914, our allies had all the world to draw on for food. Wheat, for example, came from Russia, Rumania, Bulgaria, India, Australia, Argentina, Canada and the United States. The submarine campaign cut our allies off from practically all these markets except the United States and Canada. At the same time their own already inadequate production fell off terribly. For instance, the average French wheat crop for the three pre-war years was 324,187,000 bushels. In the first year of the war France produced 282,689,000 bushels. Her 1917–18 wheat crop fell to 144,149,000 bushels. Between August 1, 1914, and January 1, 1918, th number of hogs in France decreased from 7,000,0 to 4,000,000—a loss of 43 per cent. French catt decreased 16 per cent. in number in the first tw years of the war, and her dairy products fell off per cent. in the same period. And what was tr of France was true in greater or less proportions our other allies. Enormous numbers of cattle we stolen by the Germans in the invaded countries. T skilled farmers in all the belligerent countries were the trenches. The farms, worked by unskilled hand and lacking manure and fertilizers, yearly yielded le

At the same time, the needs of our allies for fo actually increased. Soldiers eat more than averag men, and all the able-bodied men in the Enten countries were soldiers. The crisis came in the winte of 1917. Our allies absolutely had to have 577,000,0 bushels of wheat if they were to be able to carry the war any longer. They were living on ration that would barely sustain life and strength. T submarine campaign made it almost impossible get food from any place other than North Americ and the total exportable surplus of wheat in th United States and Canada was 227,000,000 bushel Indeed, so desperate was the situation during th winter of 1917–18 that both England and Italy we on the verge of starvation, and at one time Fran actually had only a three-day supply of food for her civilian population within her borders!

American flour at Pireus, Greece, on its way to end hunger

HEN it was that Mr. Hoover appealed to us to eat less meat and wheat and sugar and fats. nen it was that we observed meatless and wheatless ys and lived on Victory bread. The Food Ad-inistrators of the Allied nations did not dare to let e world know how desperate was the situation. ut they watched almost breathlessly to see what we uld do, how we would respond to the appeals for nservation. Everybody knows how we met those peals. Everybody knows how we cut down our nsumption of meat and wheat and created huge portable surpluses where none had existed a few eeks before. Back and forth across the ocean, like uttles in a loom, flew the food ships, carrying their e-giving cargoes. Had there been a total inter-ption of such traffic for even a fortnight, France ould have starved, her armies would have surren-ered through hunger, and the war would have been st. 'For she was living a hand-to-mouth existence. ut the food ships did not stop. There was always ough food on hand to load them as fast as they rived. And one of the main reasons why we were ble so greatly to reduce our consumption of com-ercial supplies and thus load the food ships was ecause some millions of Americans had been culti-ating war gardens during the previous summer, d millions of bushels of root crops were in the root llars and millions of cans of food were on the pantry elves. In a very large measure American gardeners ade it possible to save the food that tided our allies er the pinch and so eventually made the winning of e war possible.

If we would understand more exactly what America ccomplished in the way of saving and shipping food, e have only to compare our 1917 food shipments ith our shipments in pre-war days. During the ree-year period before the war, according to figures ublished by the Department of Agriculture, our verage meat exportation was 493,848,000 pounds year. In 1917 we exported 2,000,000,000 pounds—n increase of 400 per cent! Similarly our exports of utter in 1913 totaled slightly more than 3,500,000 ounds. In 1917 we exported approximately 26,750,-00 pounds. Before the war our shipments of cheese veraged 2,500,000 pounds. In 1917 they exceeded 6,000,000 pounds. And our exportation of con-ensed milk jumped from 16,500,000 pounds to 259,-00,000 pounds. During the first two and three-uarters years of the war, while we were neutral, our verage shipment of cornmeal was 96,978 barrels. uring our first year as a belligerent we shipped ,194,072 barrels—an increase of 1,131 per cent. imilarly our shipments of bread and biscuits in-reased 1,580 per cent.; of fresh fish, 2,737 per cent.; f rice, 4,822 per cent.

BUT send as much as we might, our allies grew progressively shorter of food. Cut after cut as made in the various rations. For instance, the verage ration in Italy just prior to the signing of the rmistice consisted of the following amounts of food: read, 9 ounces a day; two and a half ounces of rice nd two and a half ounces of alimentary pastes to be ad on alternate days; sugar, 7 ounces a month; live oil, one-half quart a month.

Yet the first result of the signing of the armistice, n Italy, was an actual reduction in this starvation iet! For though the war is unquestionably ended, he struggle is nowhere near an end. For this war as far more than a conflict with Germany. The mashing of Germany is only a part of the struggle; hat the Allies have been fighting for is to make the orld safe for democracy. The winning of the war as brought democracy into being in a dozen places. ut it has not made those places safe as yet for that emocracy. So we must carry on until the world is afe for democracy.

But we must carry on hereafter, not with guns and cannon, but with food. All Europe, including the democracies so recently created and created at such terrible cost, is hungry. Hunger is remorseless, conscienceless, with no sense of right and justice. It is the parent of chaos and anarchy. The world will be safe for democracy when it has enough food, and not before. If we are to complete our task, we must henceforth raise, not armies, but food.

The amount of food needed is beyond comprehension. Last year, or rather the last year for which we have statistics, the crop year of 1917–18, our farmers produced crops that broke all records by hundreds of millions of bushels. Out of that enormous harvest we shipped to our allies 11,820,000 tons of food. That was the quantity we saved by all our self-denial and general reduction in consumption. Our crops last fall were not as large as those of the preceding year; yet Mr. Hoover has given his word that we shall supply this year 20,000,000 tons of food!

The reason we must ship so much is because we have so many more mouths to feed. We are now helping to feed, not merely the Entente Allies, but democracy in Europe. During the war we fed, in addition to our own 100,000,000 people, 125,000,000 of our allies—or rather we helped to feed them. Now the food that met the needs of 225,000,000 people must be stretched so as to meet the needs of our "little allies," of the neutral victims of German barbarity, and of Russia. Out little allies and the starving neutrals number 180,000,000 people. Russia has 160,000,000 additional souls. Altogether we are morally bound to assist with food these 340,000,000 people in addition to the millions we helped to feed during the war. In all, we must help to feed more than half a billion people. Mr. Hoover has made the statement that of the 420,000,000 people in Europe only 40,000,000 have sufficient food to last them until the next harvest.

In fact, millions must starve before we can get food to them. The Food Administration pointed out, early in December, that if the food were then in ships in Russian ports, it would be impossible, because of poor traffic facilities in the interior of the country, to get that food into northern Russia this winter; and that in consequence it was almost certain that 10,000,000 people would starve to death. Nothing in all this horrible war has been so horrible as that. And unless we ship the necessary food, this is only a prelude to what must follow.

As lovers of democracy, as humane people, as Christians, we are morally bound to supply, to the very extent of available shipping facilities, the food needed by these people. And since our farmers cannot greatly increase their output this year, the food must come from the only remaining source that is possible—our back-yard and vacant-lot gardens.

The possibilities of garden production are beyond belief. Take, for instance, the development of gardening in England. Very early in the war the British government saw that, if starvation was to be prevented, city people would have to become, at least temporarily, producers as well as consumers of food. So in 1916 Parliament passed a law ordering that all untaxed land not used for food production should be commandeered. County councils and borough and town boards were given the power to do this commandeering and allot the land to persons willing and able to produce food on it. More than 2,000,000 such allotments had been made by 1918. As a result of this return to the land, England's potato crop in 1918 was sufficient to feed herself and to permit the sending of some surplus potatoes to France.

IN AMERICA our Government has done little to stimulate gardening, but local organizations have pushed garden campaigns here and there with great success. To produce an adequate amount of garden food this year, we must put all possible idle land to work. And that can be done only through some sort of organized community effort. The best way is to make a garden survey and find out how much land there is available for gardening within the community and arrange to put this land to work. Every community has at least one fine farm within its boundaries in the shape of unused back yards and vacant lots. Many cities have scores of farms. Denver organized for garden production in 1917, and the result was 30,000 war gardens within the city. Marion, Indiana, also had a garden campaign. With fewer than 28,000 inhabitants, it had more than 14,000 war gardens. Denver's garden crops were conservatively valued at $2,000,000. The National War Garden Commission estimates the value of our 1918 war garden products at $525,000,000—and that estimate is purposely very conservative. If we raised that quantity of food in our gardens last year, this year we could and should produce a billion dollars' worth.

And we should do so, not only for the sake of hungry fellow democrats abroad, but for our own sake as well. Gardening offers an opportunity to effect a larger saving than we can make in any other way. The food bill is one of the largest items in the family budget. And food is one item in the budget that cannot be omitted.

The yield of a back-yard garden is surprising. Three years ago we took from our smallest garden—a plot forty feet square—products worth at that time $70. The high prices of today would increase the value of that crop considerably. Any well-worked back-yard garden of equal size should yield as much. That yield, stated otherwise, means a Liberty Bond and $20 of war savings stamps or an Armenian baby kept alive more than a year. Certainly that should be an inducement to any one to become a gardener.

BUT money value is not all that one gets from gardening. He who has never eaten products raised in his own garden hardly knows the taste of fresh vegetables. The commercial supplies of vegetables purchasable in cities are many hours old, at best, before they reach the housewife, and often several days old. Changes take place in vegetables immediately after picking that often quite alter the taste and toughen the fiber. Vegetables that grow in the back yard need not be picked until they are needed. Thus gardening makes it possible for one to have products of the very first quality.

But the greatest gain of all, perhaps, is the physical betterment that comes from working in the garden. The majority of us lead lives that keep our nerves under tension, and make us irritable and nervous. The great corrective for such a condition is the exercising of the muscles, particularly such exercises as the bending of the body and the use of the trunk muscles. And these movements one gets in gardening.

Fighting has indeed ceased: but the war is by no means over. We have yet to complete our task of making the world safe for democracy, and we have still to pay for the accomplishment of that end. The patriotic American must work harder, produce more, use less, save more, and give more than he ever has before. The basic munition for our war was food and the war garden was a fighting unit. It continues the basic munition for the continuation of the struggle and now let Peace gardens enlist for service. By self-denial we have saved millions of pounds of food for our allies. Now we must do even better. Let us continue to save. But let us also produce. Let us make our desert back yards and vacant lots blossom like the rose. So shall those hitherto despised and neglected areas, like the stone that the builders rejected, become the head of the corner—the cornerstone in the structure of democracy that we are helping to erect in the world.

World Sin and Its Cures

THEOLOGIANS have discussed the world-war from many viewpoints. It has been treated, first, as the crime of an individual or of a group of individuals; second, as the sin of a grossly offending nation; and now we have the third aspect presented in a notable sermon by Dr. Wotherspoon of Edinburgh, in which he boldly associates the war with "the sin of the world." He says:

> "If we may assume any moral system for the universe, or any God who judges the earth, we may also assume a connection between these two things—the war which desolates the world and the sin of the world. . . . The sin, it may be further assumed, is world-sin; not the sin of individuals, not the crime of some particular date—it is a world-war, the system which has collapsed is a world-system; the process leading to the collapse must be traced in world-history."

But this startling diagnosis does not end here. The author continues:

> "Nor do we learn much unless we recognize the sin, what it is—that it is the sin of a world which knows God and does not glorify him as God—which does not like to have God in its knowledge; that it is the sin of a Christendom which confesses Christ, but will not have him to reign; which has limited his authority to private occasions, and has excluded it in social and public affairs; a Christendom which has told Christ to mind his own business (which is the saving of souls), and to let society and the world alone. Germany perfected that sin; are we clear of it?"

Dr. Wotherspoon's arraignment is being widely discussed, and many leading thinkers have pointed out that the only remedy that could save the world is the Christian religion—that everything else is a side issue, and that, eliminating Christianity, the world would be left to continual war. In an article on the subject in the Biblical Review, Dr. Robert E. Speer points out that the confusion has been increased by the Christian Church being enlisted on both sides of the struggle. The Church's conception of her mission, he thinks, has been a blurred one. Now, however, with clearer vision, she realizes her true mission, which is to preach to the nations the "Way Out" through Righteousness, Repentance, Service and Faith. It is the Church's business to deliver this fourfold message to all nations and to be an international instrumentality to that end.

Carried to its logical conclusion, this argument leads inevitably to the conviction that only by a united Church, all the branches of which work harmoniously and with a single clear purpose in view, can this gigantic task be undertaken. Church Unity—the cooperation of all the bodies that should be united as a Gospel army—is essential to victory. "A house divided against itself cannot stand."

Prohibition's Day

IT IS not at all surprising that the friends of Prohibition should have been so confident of the result of the nation-wide campaign. Prohibition is no longer in the experimental stage; it passed that long ago. In the "try-outs" through the line of states that have been dry long enough to record results, some remarkable things are disclosed. In Nebraska, the State Bank Board reports 70,000 more bank depositors in one year, and an increase of $58,000,000 in deposits. Twelve months after the state went dry, the dipsomaniac ward of the State Hospital—which formerly was full, with scores of patients on the waiting list—was empty, and no applicants in sight. No need for asking Nebraska's opinion of prohibition! Kansas officially reports, as a result of dry conditions, increase of health, happiness and prosperity in every department of this state's life. State taxes have been reduced 50 per cent. and millions of dollars of indebtedness have been paid off; the state has accumulated a surplus of $10,000,000, and now carries cash balances in seven different state banks, netting $43,000 yearly. Not a single Kansas draftee was rejected in the army on account of alcoholism. General Leonard Wood, commander of Camp Funston, has declared that the efficiency of the soldiers of that state has increased 25 per cent. and that "it is easy-going to conduct a model army camp at Funston." In Oklahoma, the Chamber of Commerce at Tulsa reports that since going dry the state has developed more rapidly than any other in the Union. There are thousands of its citizens who have never seen a saloon, and in this respect Oklahoma differs from Illinois, for the reason, as the observant New York Evening Post remarks, that "Illinois contains Chicago, Chicago contains Germans, and Germans contain beer." Crime in Oklahoma has been reduced 95 per cent. Even the red men in the former Indian territory are benefiting immensely. If asked to vote tomorrow on a "wet" proposal, the whole state would respond, to the last man, with a thunderous and unanimous "No!"

The World's Almoners

FAMINE, the legacy of the great war, is now prevailing in many of the European countries. An International Relief Supply Commission in Paris is now about to undertake the rescue of these starving multitudes. Foodstuffs representing a value of $400,000,000 will be needed to keep the populations alive until next summer. In this far-reaching work of charity the United States will have a leading part. This is not by any means the first occasion on which America has been chosen as the world's almoner. We will furnish the bulk of the food, the Allied governments paying for transportation, and also supplying all necessary clothing. Our government has already arranged to appropriate $100,000,000. At the suggestion of Mr. Hoover, who will be Director General of International Relief, a commission will establish in each of the famine-stricken countries supervising agencies for the practical distribution of supplies. It is confidently believed that such far-reaching relief will materially assist in restoring order in those countries where hunger has largely been the means of driving the people to riot and desperation. In cases where the benefited nations can afford to pay by means of exporting marketable goods they will be encouraged to do this, and they will be helped in every way to industrial restoration and self-support. There is a significant note of warning sounded by the Commission, that unless the program is carried out quickly and on the largest scale, nothing can prevent ruin from following as the sequel to present conditions. No German relief will be included, as it is understood that that nation has considerable supplies, which can be augmented by the opening of the blockade. The relief work, however, will extend into Belgium, Northern France, Southeastern and Northern Europe and Armenia. Fortunately there is available at the present time a sufficient world supply of food, which will permit such a campaign. Where possible, German shipping will be used in the transportation work. The whole plan is an enterprise worthy of nations professing to be Christian. Certainly it is one to which all who believe in the teachings of the Prince of Peace will give heartiest approval and cooperation. The last few months have demonstrated that lack of employment, or food, or both, open the way to riot and revolution, and it is certain that Bolshevism would not have attained the strength it has shown except through the hunger of Europe.

The Aspiring Soul

IT IS said that Theodore Roosevelt always believed that nine-tenths of his success was due to his intense aspiration. Maybe not nine-tenths, but surely a large part of the way will the world go to meet such a man.

Somehow everybody likes an aspiring soul that looks up and forward, that longs for the light, that shuns duplicity and darkness, and loves harmony and purity and the force they generate.

Aspiration—the longing for the good, the high and the true—elevates the mind, clarifies its qualities, sharpens the wits and gives unity, purpose and power to the life.

The man who does not feel any need of shiftin and sneaking but stands up boldly in the lig fearing nothing but to do wrong, is the man w carries conviction and weight and is bound to succe The attainment to such a character is in itself succe

There is always hope for a youth who aspir who has a divine hunger for growth, a real rega for righteousness, a longing to be better and to better. He is in tune with things and is impell forward by infinite forces more than his own.

How unfortunate—how blind—is the youth w cannot see that absolute honesty and transparen of character form the shortest route to promotio and the most direct road to success.

Law for Industrial Peace

THE paralysis of the nation's greatest port b the marine workers' strike is a revelation and warning of our lack of industrial organizatio That the tie-up of shipping lasted only three day and was ended by the intervention of President Wilso does not relieve the potential possibilities of this disastrous method.

The questions at issue between employers and employees are lost sight of in the grave question create by paralysis of public utilities, involving directly th activities and rights of 6,000,000 people and indirectl the commerce and the tranquillity of the entire nation

In this case, as in most other strikes and lockouts, third party in interest having claims not to be ignore is the public.

Whatever side our sympathies may support in an issue arising between capital and labor, the strike an the lockout are alike relics of barbarism. The metho of settlement of industrial disputes by force is a survival of that reign of might in the world to which w have sought to put an end by an enormous outlay i lives and treasure. There should be enough sense o fair play, of good judgment, of responsibility on both sides to such controversies, to make a settlement possible without recourse to industrial war. All strike and all lockouts should be made impossible and uncalled for.

We have established elaborate judicial machiner for the adjustment of differences between man an man without recourse to violence. We are seeking to establish machinery for the settlements of disput between nation and nation without recourse to wa

The issues that precipitate the strike should b settled in a normal way by normal machinery established to deal with just such situations.

The Virtue of Kindliness

VERY rarely indeed does such a frank acknowledgment of the power that sits behind th waste-basket come to us as the letter below which arrived with one of the many manuscripts tha are deposited on the editorial desk every morning

> "That this may not be consigned to the waste-basket, I enclose self-addressed envelope, for though a man could command the earth with Alexander, the sea with Moses, the fire with Elijah, and the sun wit Joshua; though he were as rich as Solomon, as stron as Samson, as swift as Ahimaaz, as beautiful as Absalom, and descended as Paul was of the blood royal, yet his manuscript may be rejected by the fourth estate."

This magniloquent message comes from New Hampshire, whose native granite gives character t the spirit and lofty utterance of its sons. It is certainly a wonderful tribute. We had no idea wha potentiality lay hidden in the hand that manipulate the blue pencil until we read that note. But we ar not disposed to be despotic—on the contrary, we ar by nature kindly, sympathetic, helpful. We have a heart as tender for budding genius and young ambition as it is appreciative of full-blown literary talen Encouragement we would rather give than censure On the whole, therefore, we shall continue to deal considerately with our manuscripts and their senders and to resist the temptation to be tyrannical i our literary judgments. After all, life is made up o many viewpoints, the result of varied experiences, and we must judge kindly accordingly.

Banquet to John Clifford

FEW men have had a larger influence on the better life of London and of England than Dr. John Clifford, the famous Bap- minister, who has had sixty con- uous years of ministerial service in borough of the city. He was a poor working in a Midland lace factory, he was so bright and so upright t the local church people educated for the Baptist ministry. No heart more deeply the wants and woes of poor people of the great city, no ds were more tireless in working their betterment, no tongue was more quent in its demands for the political hts of the plain people and religious edom of all. His courage attracted attention of the world when he led "passive resistance" movement inst the Educational Bill of 1902 hurled defiance at the House of rds for defeating the liberal Educa- Bill of 1906. The people of Lon- gave a banquet to John Clifford ently on the occasion of his eighty- ond birthday. Lloyd George another nmoner who was a poor Welsh work- boy was at the banquet, and said ong other things: "I would rather g a coin on John Clifford's conscience n that of any other man I know in gland." Dr. Clifford in his remarks ied the young ministers their op- tunities in these great times, and ressed his complete faith that Christ uld lead the Church and State to the ution of every problem of reconstruc- and redemption to be considered. d then the grand old man said: "As itness to Jesus Christ as the one who make the most of men and the best men I have tried to live. And what- you have passed on me today in way of honor and praise I pass on Jesus Christ, my Master, my Sa- r, my Lord, my King, who has de of me whatever good there has n in me, and has achieved through whatever has been helpful to my . To Him I give all the praise and glory," which is but another way of ing: "Nevertheless I live; yet not I, Christ liveth in me: and the life ch I now live in the flesh I live by the th of the Son of God, who loved me, and himself for me." (Gal. 2 : 20.)

ew Meat Drying Method

DR. ARTHUR H. McKEE, professor of chemical engineering at olumbia University, announced the her day that he and his staff had evolved a drying process for meats and fish that they thought was superior to any other and would cause a great saving in shipping space and refrigeration without deterioration in food values. So little change was made in the flavor and food content of the dried meat, Dr. McKee said, that Columbia faculty members and soldiers were unable to detect any difference from fresh meat. Bone, waste, fat, and connective tissue are removed from the meat or fish and it is then cut into cubes or steaks, placed in a vacuum enclosure and subjected to a long period of drying at low temperature. No other treatment is needed. The addition of water to the meat or fish restores its freshness so fully that when it is used in hash, stews, or other dishes that do not require large pieces, it tastes just like the original article. It is not possible to treat roasts by this process, but smaller pieces even as large as a steak can be kept for almost any length of time. It is claimed that this process of curing is not expensive, the cost not being more than that of refrigeration. Over a year ago experiments for drying meats and fish for the armies were begun by Dr. K. G. Falk and Dr. E. M. Frankel. Dr. Falk is a graduate of Columbia and was an instructor there. Dr. Frankel is assisting Dr. McKee at Columbia University. It is to be hoped that all these men claim for the new process of meat preservation will be verified, and that this new blessing may come to the race. The Jews, like other primitive peoples, were a nation of herdsmen and shepherds. They had to raise herds and flocks for their religious sacrifices as well as for their own consumption. They raised vegetables, fruits and grains, but they were essentially meat-eaters. On their way from Egypt to Canaan the children of Israel were told not to touch a foot of land in Edom or forage upon it, but to pay for what they needed, including meat as an article of food. "Ye shall buy meat of them for money, that ye may eat." (Deut. 2 : 6.)

Sir Arthur Pearson

Blind Nobleman Leading Blind

A MOST remarkable figure is Sir Arthur Pearson, the noted publisher of London. Six years ago he owned a half-dozen metropolitan dailies and a number of weekly and monthly magazines. At the zenith of his strength, wealth and fame he became suddenly blind, and was told that there was nothing left for him but to be resigned to his fate. He declined to resign, and said that though his eyes had gone back on him, he was going to see without them; to do as much work, have as good a time, and be as useful as before. He sold his dailies, but kept his weekly and monthly magazines, and so thoroughly adjusted himself to the new conditions that he concluded to help others who were blind into a condition of independence, usefulness and happiness. So in Regent's Park, London, which beautiful estate was loaned to him for the purpose by a wealthy American, Mr. Otto Kahn, he founded St. Dunstan's Hostel for Sailors and Soldiers. The central idea of the institution is that the blind soldiers can live a normal life, make an honest living, and generally return to their old employments. Carpentering, plumbing, massaging, barbering, stenography, typewriting, basket-weaving, and many other vocations, are taught in the school. Sir Arthur says his men can go back to their old callings and succeed better than before, and he helps them to get back. There are some 400 in St. Dunstan's now, and 600 who have been graduated are doing splendidly in the world's industry. Mr. Pearson has been on a visit to this country to confer with the Red Cross in its efforts to care for the dear boys in our land and get them back to normal, successful, happy lives. Arthur Pearson needs no title to his name. He is a noble man without it; one of the greatest benefactors of the time. He is teaching the world the great lesson that it is not the eye of flesh that sees, but the mind that does the seeing and the heart that sees duty, truth, love and God: "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God." (Matt. 5 : 8.)

Fell Kissing Blarney Stone

PETER McGUIRE of the United States Navy undertook to kiss the Blarney stone in the wall of the castle eight miles from the city of Cork, Ireland, the other day, and though he fell over a hundred feet, strange to say he was not killed or even seriously injured. McGuire was a member of a party of American sailors conducted by the Young Men's Christian Association to Blarney Castle. He watched other Yankee bluejackets kiss the Blarney stone high up on the outer wall of the castle. The approved method is for a strong man to grasp the candidate's left leg and arm, another his right leg and arm, then swinging him out over the abyss as far as they can reach, let the intrepid one bounce his nose against the scarcely attainable rock, call it a kiss, and let it go at that. Not so McGuire; he knew he could reach out over the ledge and kiss the Blarney stone across the way without assistance. As he had almost attained his goal he lost his balance and fell 110 feet. The castle keeper hurried down to pick up the dead sailor, and found that after falling sixty feet he had hit the limb of a tree, breaking it, then another, and still a third, leaving a fall of but fifteen feet. The keeper who ran down stairs to pick the dead man up and found him alive, showing that native Irish wit that would have fun at a funeral, pretended to be angry and said: "What did you do that for?" The sailor said: "What?" "Why, break that tree. Don't you see that sign, 'Do not injure the shrubbery in these grounds?'" The stone in the outer wall of Blarney Castle has world-wide fame. It is claimed that kissing it imparts the gift of flattery, so that when complimentary words are spoken one is likely to say: "Ah, I see you have kissed the Blarney stone." While there is often too little commendation for the worthy acts of friends that are loved, words of favor without sense and heart back of them are insincere flattery, and an impertinence to the one addressed. Blarney stone flattery is thus condemned: "A man that flattereth his neighbor spreadeth a net for his feet" (Prov. 29 : 5.)

Fall Loses Race

SLIPPING and falling on the wet pavement in the final 200 yards of his four-and-a-half-mile journey, Max Bohland lost the prize in the Morningside Athletic Club race in New York recently. William Stokely, who was pressing him, got to the goal first. Occasionally a person almost at the end of the race of life slips and falls, and it is one of the saddest of pictures. As a rule the habits grow steadier and the faith stronger as old age approaches and the crown of victory is in view, in obedience to this injunction: "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." (Rev. 2 : 10.)

The Mission of the Church

*A SERMON BY REV. JAMES T. NICHOLS

TEXT—I Tim. 3 : 16. "Great is the mystery of godliness."

AS A young minister, Timothy had his hands full. His problems were those of the city. Located in the metropolitan city of Ephesus, he was in the very heart of idolatrous worship. The great temple of Diana which was accounted as one of the seven wonders of the world, was there. This building, it is said, was the most splendid temple ever dedicated to the worship of an idol.

The apostle Paul founded or organized the church in Ephesus. He first preached in the Jewish synagogue; but within three months he had to move out. The Jews couldn't stand such preaching. Nearby was a great private school, called the School of Tyrannus, and the leaders of this institution tendered the Apostle the use of their auditorium, perhaps as an advertisement for the school. Here he held services for nearly three years, during which time he visited neighboring towns establishing churches, so much so that it was said "that all Asia received the word of God."

Paul's preaching was not only eloquent but very plain. He called a spade a spade. He denounced idolatry and the worshippers of Diana. His preaching was so effective that the fakirs who sold souvenirs of the temple were losing their trade. Even today, a minister often gets into trouble by saying something which interferes with certain business enterprises. One reason why a lot of the preaching of the present day does not amount to anything is because the preacher aims at nothing and hits it. Paul was the bravest preacher of his day. He went after wrong-doing with hammer and tongs.

As might be expected, the opposition organized against Paul gathered a mob, and by trickery and appealing to superstition, undertook to kill the Apostle. They would have succeeded, no doubt, had not the officers interfered. The story of this whole proceeding is found in the nineteenth chapter of the Acts. Seeing that his life was in danger, and feeling that he could do more good elsewhere, Paul left the city.

It is only natural that Paul would, in course of time, recommend Timothy to take up the work in Ephesus. He knew Timothy. This young man had received the Gospel under Paul's preaching and had been in close touch with him all the years. When Timothy went to Ephesus to take charge of the work, Paul knew what a time he would have, and wrote him a letter occasionally to cheer and encourage him.

IN THIS first letter, near the close of the third chapter, Paul tells Timothy that he hopes to visit him soon, but is writing, so that in case he is delayed, Timothy will know how he should act in the house of God, which he says is, "the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth." At that word "ground" in a reference Bible, we note a character referring to the margin and here will be found the word "stay." In the emphatic Diaglot, the word "support" is used. Thus the reading might be "the pillar and stay of the truth" or "the pillar and support of the truth." Literally Paul was saying, "Timothy, as the pillars yonder hold the heathen temple of Diana so high that all can see it, the real mission of the Church of the living God is to hold up the truth so the whole world can see it. It is the pillar and support of the truth."

Then the aged apostle proceeds to give the young minister an outline of this truth, and it would be hard indeed to get a more complete life of Jesus into fewer words than are here used. This part of Paul's letter is one of the most wonderful sermon outlines in print. Without any controversy he says, it is a revelation of the great "mystery of godliness." It is significant that the first part of the truth to be emphasized is the Divinity of Christ—that he was God manifest in the flesh. This idea that Jesus of Nazareth was simply a good man, but not the divine Son of God, and that we can all be sons of God in the same sense, has no place in the Church of the living God. As Paul says most emphatically in the first Corinthian letter, if Christ is not risen from the dead, our faith is vain, and we are yet in our sins, and the holy apostles are all false witnesses, for they testified of God that he raised up Christ from the dead.

If Christ was not divine, how could he have performed those wonderful miracles?

But we have other evidence besides miracles that Jesus was God manifest in the flesh. In the first chapter of John's Gospel we read: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him. Without him was not anything made that was made." In the fourteenth verse of the same chapter we have the explanation. "And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." We see plain as day that this refers to Christ. He was in the beginning with God. A dozen passages of like reference come rushing to our minds. "God who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in times past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the world." (Heb. 1 : 1-2. Col. 1 : 13-17.) Jesus said on one occasion, "Before Abraham was I am." "Thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world." Others might be quoted.

The next part of the truth, as stated by Paul, is "Justified in the spirit." Justify, we are told, comes from a word that means, "To make or declare right." Christ claimed to be the Son of God. To justify him would be to declare that he was what he professed to be. Was there a time in his life among men when God, who is spirit, spoke to the people in a language they could understand, saying that Jesus was his own Son? Here again several passages come to mind.

One day, John the Baptist was baptizing people in the Jordan and Jesus presented himself for the rite. John hesitated, stating that he should rather be baptized of Jesus; but Jesus insisted saying "Suffer it to be so now; for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness." John hesitated no longer. The rite finished, the heavens were opened "And lo a voice from heaven saying, this is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." Again, in Matthew, we have the account of the Transfiguration—how with Peter, James and John, Jesus was upon the mountain when they were permitted to see him in his glory. The scene was wonderful. These men never forgot it and often mentioned it. As Jesus stood between Moses and Elijah his countenance was bright as the sun and his clothing white as the light. While they were beholding the marvelous manifestation of his glory, "behold a voice out of the cloud which said, this is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him." This is not only justifying Jesus but it is an announcement of the fact that the disciples are not to listen to Moses or Elijah but to Jesus—his word was to be their law.

AS THE first part of the truth that the Church must hold up to the world is the divinity of Christ, and the second part is God's own audible acknowledgment of the fact that Jesus was his own Son, it is only natural that the third point should be the witness of heavenly angels. "Seen of angels" is the declaration here. Again and again they visited him and ministered to him during the days of his earthly ministry.

After the baptism, Jesus was led into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. Observe that he was not tempted of God nor of the Spirit, but was led into temptation. God does not tempt men although He has often led them where they will be tested, and our prayer should be "Lead us not into temptation." Realizing our weakness, we should ask the Father not to lead us too far lest we fall. After the forty days hunger and terrible temptation through which Jesus passed without giving way the devil gave up the task and left him and the record states, "and behold, angels came and ministered unto him." If the angels are ministering spirits sent to those who are heirs of salvation, and if there is ever a time when they come, surely it is the time after we have had a great battle with temptation and come out victorious.

Then too, when Jesus was in the Garden of Gethsemane praying and sweating great drops of blood, "there appeared an angel unto him from hea strengthening him." Later, when the mob ca upon them and Peter showed fight, Jesus rebu him saying, "Put up again thy sword. . . . Think thou that I cannot now pray to my Father and shall presently give me more than twelve legions angels?" The angels sang at his birth and the a were at the tomb when he rose from the dead.

Confidence Betrayed

I BREATHED a careless, happy, idle song,
That floated off upon a vagrant breeze,
And lost itself among the whispering trees;
Then through the verdant maze it wandered long.

I did not know my song when it returned,
A lovely, flattering echo, lost in part,
Because it strayed into your open heart
And then stole back to tell me how it yearned.

THOMAS GRANT SPRINGER

The next division of this wonderful sermon outl Paul gave to Timothy is preached "unto the G tiles." On the surface, this seems to be a va phrase; but on looking carefully at it, we find so thing significant. For four thousand years, Go dealings had been with the Jews, and they belie that the Gentiles were no better than the dogs in street. Here then is one who was brought up at feet of the greatest of all Jewish teachers declar that the Church must remember and preach that story of the life of Christ and his Gospel is for Gentile as well as the Jew. Four times in the sac Word, are we told that God is no respecter of perso and when the Church ceases to put into practice t idea, it is no longer the Church of the living God.

"Believed on in the world" is the next point, a it is a good one too. The ultimate triumph of Gospel over evil is as sure as prophecy. Some that the Church is losing its power and the world getting worse and worse. In spite of division a blundering men and women, the Church has alive and fostered the spirit of Christ through all years, until it is really getting hold of the hearts of peoples. Never before were ideals so high or heroic spirit of sacrifice so manifest as now. Ne before was so much money and service given for alleviation of suffering as today. Yes, the world better today than it was yesterday, and it will better tomorrow than it is today. In fact, history one great cycle of the improvement of mankind. are even looking forward to a saloonless world, an warless world as well!

GOING along the banks of the Mississippi Riv some time ago, I saw a place where one cou throw a stick into the water, and it would actua float back toward the north. But I would not so foolish as to go over the country and procla that the river had changed its course. Everyo knows that the great body of this Father of Wat is flowing on toward the gulf. True, there are edd along the bank where some obstruction causes whirl, and there the water would seem to actua flow backward.

There may be communities or even nations whe the Church is losing its power, but there is always cause; and these are exceptions rather than the ru We all know that the German universities cut Chr out of their Bible long ago, and now the result is ma fest. We know that the German Government enco aged the Bolsheviki in Russia, and now their "chic ens are coming home to roost."

Six hundred years before Christ was born in Beth hem, the prophet said that the Kingdom of Heav would break in pieces all other kingdoms and fill t whole earth. Be of good cheer, ye soldiers of t cross. God's plan for saving the world is not a failu but a glorious success!

With the last word in this great outline to Timoth the circle is complete. "Received up into glory" that word. Jesus left heaven, came down to ear lived a matchless life among men, revealed the gre heart of the Father, was nailed to the cross on C vary, was buried and rose again, remained with disciples some forty days and then went back heaven. He said to his disciples, "Let not yo heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare place for you. And if I go and prepare a place f you, I will come again and receive you unto myse that where I am, there ye may be also."

It was my happy privilege, some years ago, to sta on the place on the Mount of Olives which traditi indicates as the spot where Jesus stood on that mem able Ascension day. I do not know whether it is t exact spot or not. But I do know that somewhe near it, Jesus stood, with his disciples gathered abo him and that he there ascended heavenward. T amazed disciples watched him as he went higher a higher until he was lost amid the clouds. Even th they could not turn their eyes away and, "Beho two men stood by them in white apparel; and whi also said, ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken from you into heaven, shall so come in like mann as ye have seen him go into heaven." Would you ready should he come today?

The Transformation of Plain Jane

By ESTHER DELAND

TEPPING quickly out of the open French window, Jane found herself alone on the veranda of the Alden homestead. There was no he said to herself, she just couldn't it always to be a "wall-flower"! e had hoped things would be differ- t this party. But the whole evening een a repetition of her previous so- xperiences. ane, I have the most wonderful secret. Let's go up to your room—I want to show you something."

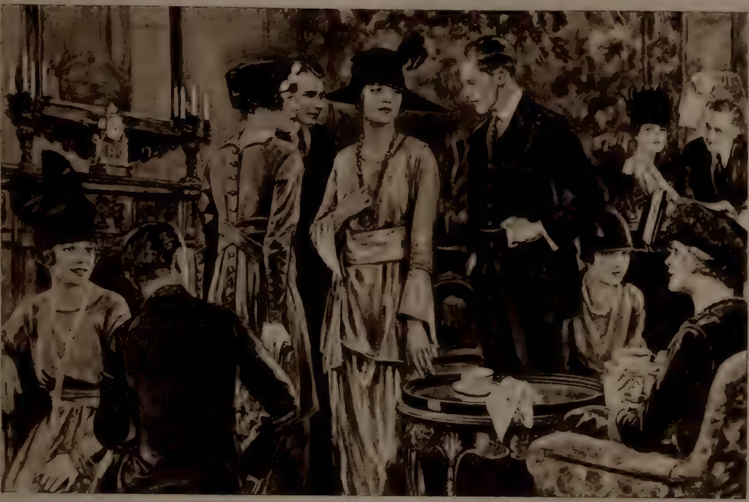
A moment later Jane entered her own room. Her long French mirror had been moved to the center of the floor and there beside it, draped gracefully over the high back of her favorite chair, was a wonderful creation of exquisite platinum grey crêpe meteor with coral trimmings—the prettiest party dress Jane had ever seen!

Stifling something between a sob and a gasp, she gazed in rapture at it for one long moment, then sprang forward and caught it up. With shining eyes she faced the mirror, holding the unbelievably charming dress full-length in front of her.

"Oh! Mother! Isn't it beautiful? But—how could you get it when we need the money so much for other things?"

"It's all right, dear!" Mrs. Elliott said. "Now you sit down and accept Margaret's invitation—I promise that you will be satisfied when I tell you the whole secret! Oh! Jane, it has worked out so much better than I dared to hope!"



Drawing by Edward A. Poucher

No one had ever realized before how pretty she was!

AT last the afternoon of February 5th came. Jane had taken longer than usual to dress, and as a result she was a little late in getting started to Margaret's party. Approaching the house, she hesitated—a remnant of her former backwardness coming over her for just a moment. Then she smiled a happy little smile, and with madly beating heart rang the bell.

A maid let her in and helped her off with her wraps. One passing glance in the long mirror banished the old timidity. And even before she encountered the critical eye of the drawing room, Jane Elliott knew she had at last come into her own!

There was a new sparkle in her eyes, as with the utmost simplicity and grace she swept through the heavy portieres and out among the guests. And surmounting all this, the magic transformation from plain, almost shabby clothes to radiantly stylish and beautiful attire simply made her a new creature!

Although a moment before a dozen little groups of guests had been scattered through the room, there was now only one group, and it centered around Jane. No one had realized before how pretty she was!

Never did an afternoon fly like that one! Every little second was filled with excitement and happiness for Jane. And when at last it was over she fairly ran home and, smothering with kisses a slender, eager, motherly figure in black, she cried:

"Oh, Mother, dear! This wonderful Cinderella dress has given me the happiest day of my life! Can't you tell me all about it now?"

"Yes, Jane," Mrs. Elliott replied. "I can't keep it any longer myself. Sit right down here beside me and listen. All our happiness today began that unhappy evening when you came home, heartbroken, from Gertrude Alden's party. After you had gone upstairs, I sat here wondering how I could help you, when suddenly I remembered reading about an institute of domestic arts and sciences that had developed a wonderful new method by which any woman or girl anywhere could learn right at home in spare time how to make all kinds of dresses and hats.

"I hunted the magazine out and read it over again and I saw at once that if I could learn to make dainty, stylish and becoming clothes for you and for myself it would mean the truest kind of economy, besides saving you a repetition of your experience at Gertrude's party. Before I went to bed that night I wrote and asked the Woman's Institute how I could learn to make our clothes.

"You know I had never learned to sew—it wasn't necessary before your father's death, and afterward it wasn't possible. But the information I received proved a revelation. The Institute provided just the opportunity I needed, so I joined at once and took up dressmaking.

"When my first lesson came, I realized that any woman could learn dressmaking by this wonderful new plan! The language is so simple a child could understand it, and the pictures are simply marvelous.

"The best part of all is that right away you begin making actual garments. I have some beautiful things in my closet where I hid all my lessons and my work. You see I wanted to be sure my plan would work before I told you about it.

"The course can easily be completed in a few months by studying an hour or two each day. And any woman who is at all interested in clothes couldn't help learning rapidly. The textbooks foresee and explain everything. And the teachers take just as personal an interest in you as if they were right beside you.

"Besides learning how to make every kind of garment at a saving of half or more, I also learned what colors and fabrics are most appropriate for different types of women, how to really develop style and how to add those little touches that make clothes distinctly becoming.

"The lessons followed each other so naturally that I soon learned how to copy models you see in the shop windows, on the streets, or in fashion magazines. In fact, this wonderful method has really made me more capable than most professional dressmakers—after just a few months of spare-time study at home!

"Of course, as a member I had an opportunity to learn a great deal about the Institute and its work. Jane, it's perfectly wonderful what this great school is doing for women and girls all over the world! You see it makes no difference where you live, because all the instruction is carried on by mail. And it is no disadvantage if you are employed during the day or have household duties that occupy most of your time, because you can devote as much or as little time to the course as you wish, and just whenever it is convenient. This has made it possible for women and girls of all ages and in all circumstances to take the Institute's courses.

"SO that's my secret, dear," continued Mrs. Elliott. "I made every stitch of your party dress myself! It didn't cost half as much as some of our old ordinary clothes. Furthermore, now that you know, too, I'm going to transform all our clothes of previous seasons into stylish new garments. A whole section of my course was devoted to renovating and remodeling garments so they retain all their charm in the new fashionable lines.

"Best of all," finished Mrs. Elliott, "the Institute has solved the problem of our future, for now I can go into business as a professional dressmaker. You have always been so clever about trimming hats that I want you to take the Institute's course in millinery. We'll open a little shop—have a business of our own, with a splendid income—and be together all the time."

"Oh, Mother!" exclaimed Jane, "isn't it wonderful? I'd so much rather do that than to go into an office! And can I really learn to be a successful milliner?"

"Yes, dear! There isn't any question but that with the help of the Woman's Institute, any woman or girl anywhere can easily learn everything there is to know about dressmaking or millinery!"

MRS. ELLIOTT was right! More than 15,000 women and girls in city, town and country have proved that you can quickly learn at home, in spare time, through the Woman's Institute, to make all your own and your children's clothes and hats or prepare for success in dressmaking or millinery as a business.

It costs you nothing to find out what the Institute can do for you. Just send a letter, post-card or the convenient coupon below and you will receive—without obligation—by return mail the full story of this great school that has brought the happiness of having dainty, becoming clothes, savings almost too good to be true, and the joy of being independent in a successful business, to women and girls all over the world.

Two Laws of Prophetic Interpretation

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

I

IN OUR previous article, "How to Interpret Prophecy," it was said that one should be familiar with the whole Bible, and hints were given on how to study it to that end. Selecting Amos as the earliest book of the prophets, and reading it in the way and in the spirit indicated, it will be found to divide itself as follows:

(1) There is the inscription or introduction, covering verses 1 and 2 of chapter 1, and giving the prophet's name and location, his early occupation, his period and his objective as a prophet.

(2) Then follows a brief section devoted to messages concerning the Gentile nations contiguous to Israel, and a single message to the kingdom of Judah.

(3) Then, at verse 6 of chapter 1, begins the record of the specific messages to Israel, to which kingdom the prophet tells us he was specially sent.

Having previously acquainted ourselves with the record of his period in II Kings, giving the outward or political condition of Israel in that day, we now discover from his messages delivered to the kings, the priests and the people just what was its inward or moral condition at the same time. In this sense he is speaking to the people of his own day about the things of that day.

And no one can misunderstand the language he employs. You can hear the swish of the whip of small cords as it falls upon the nation's back. Their covetousness, their sensuality, their idolatry, their oppression of the poor, their stubbornness under divine chastisement, make up a case against them which is presented with the vividness and imagination of a great poet. Amos was the Robert Burns of Israel without the latter's weaknesses of character.

The punishment of Israel is also foretold and described. Figures of speech are used, drawn chiefly from the prophet's earlier experiences as a herdsman and gatherer of sycamore fruit. But these figures of speech are no more difficult to understand than those of the uninspired poetry of our own time. Their meaning is ascertained in the same way. You must become familiar with the physical environment of the prophet as shown in the historical books; you must exercise a little constrained thought and perhaps peep into a commentary here or there.

These are minor matters, however, the hedges and the copses of the landscape, as compared with the broader sweep of the divine truth. When Tennyson in Locksley Hall speaks of "pilots of the purple twilight," and "argosies of magic sails," we may not catch his meaning at the moment, but that does not hinder us from knowing that "the parliament of man, the federation of the world," of which he speaks, was not then present, but was to be realized in a day still future to his imagination.

And so Amos may indulge in symbols like "a plumbline," and "a basket of summer fruit," but every reader knows that he means the Assyrian invasion, historically recorded in II Kings, when he says: "Therefore will I cause you to go into captivity beyond Damascus, saith the Lord" (Amos 5 : 27).

But the point is this: that while he speaks of judgment, and means the Assyrian captivity, he also speaks of a remnant of the nation that shall be spared. "I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob, saith the Lord." "I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth" (Amos 9 : 8, 9).

Nor does he leave us in doubt as to God's meaning here. "In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof." Or, as the later verses show, the kingdom of David will be restored in that day; Israel the conquered will become the conqueror; wasted cities will be rebuilt; the land will burst into unparalleled fruitfulness, and the whole will be stamped with the seal of permanency and perpetuity (Amos 9 : 11, 15).

II

IT IS here we meet with our first important principle of interpretation, commonly known as the law of double reference. That is to say, when the precise time of particular events is not revealed, the prophets sometimes speak of them as continuous, and sometimes blend two events in one.

As Angus, in his "Bible Handbook," puts it: "Prophecy continually applies to one object by anticipation and partially, and to another completely." Or, to express it in the words of Professor Franklin Johnson, in "Quotations of the New Testament from the Old," "the prophet is writing of what immediately or remotely concerns him, but consciously or unconsciously, most probably the latter, his words swell beyond the limits of the first and fill the channel of the second" (p. 222).

In the present instance, the partial fulfilment is the return of Judah from Babylon, but the complete fulfilment is her later return from all the countries whither God shall have driven her (Jer. 32 : 37). In other words, the historical return from Babylon bore no proportion to the greatness of this prophecy. The people were not then planted in their land, to be "pulled up out of it no more forever"; they did not then come into possession of the Gentile nations to which the prophecy refers; they did not then enjoy those material and spiritual blessings of which it speaks, for which reasons we look for another day and another historical restoration.

A further Scriptural illustration of this law may be more easily apprehended. It is Joel's familiar prophecy of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in the last days (Joel 2 : 28-32). The prophecy includes the great and notable day of the Lord, with wonderful earthly and celestial phenomena, the final redemption of Israel and the transformation of the Holy Land. Everybody knows that these things "were only incipiently and partially fulfilled to a few—an election of Israel—at the first coming of Christ, and that they await a far larger fulfilment at his second coming" ("Studies in Eschatology," West).

Dr. Johnson, in the volume referred to, renders good service by showing that the law of double reference is found not only in the Hebrew prophets, but in all the great literatures of the world, both ancient and modern. As an example of the latter, he quotes the familiar poem of Longfellow, in the early part of which a ship only is represented; then the figure of the ship passes into that of a bride passing to the arms of her husband, and finally, at the close, the commonwealth comes into view which the poet had in mind from the beginning, and he says:

"Thou too sail on, O ship of state,
Sail on, O Union, strong and great.

"We know what master laid thy keel,
What workman wrought thy ribs of steel."

So, far from being surprised to find a law of double reference in the inspired prophets, the surprise should be experienced if it were not found there.

III

BUT this leads us to the second important principle of interpretation called the law of recurrence. That is to say, the Holy Spirit sometimes states a fact, or refers to an event, in its broad outlines and then refers to it again for the purpose of adding details. "Many have overlooked this, and read the Bible as if the order of narration were always the order of accomplishment, and as if consecutive chapters were necessarily consecutive as to time. But if the Bible be read so, confusion and mistakes are certain" ("Thoughts on the Apocalypse," Newton).

The book of Hosea, who was in part a contemporary and in part a successor of Amos, affords an illustration of this principle. He was required of God to marry an unchaste woman, typical of God's relationship to Israel, an unrighteous nation. Children were born of the union, whose names also were typical or prophetic of God's subsequent dealings with Israel. For example, the last born was named "Lo Ammi," which means in Hebrew, "not my people," typifying and predicting the casting away of Israel by the Lord, thus corresponding or recurring to what Amos had already revealed.

The Pantheist Passes

I BUILDED me an altar from beams of Lebanon;
Gilt were its fragrant pillars with lacquer of the sun,
Jeweled with sard and sapphire, its linen seraph-spun.

In love its lamps I lighted to all my world held fair,
To myriad gods assembled in robes of beauty there;
And, filled with nameless trembling, I bowed me low in prayer.

My gods? Massed valley-lilies, white in their crystal urn;
A spirit-wreath from Sharon, where blood-red roses burn;
A spray of flowering olive, that dreams to Bethel turn;

A noble book of musings, in sad or happy vein;
The songs of Robert Louis, so sweet because so plain;
Amiel's mystic visions, and David's harping strain;

A swell of master music, a lilt of minstrelsy,
A chant of choiring angels, an anthem of the sea,
A dirge of Judah's bondmen beneath a willow tree;

A dawn in singing June-time, when lovers' tales are told;
A noon in life's first autumn, aflame with red and gold;
A night of starlit wonder in Israel's shepherd fold;

A dream of love made perfect 'neath kindly smiling skies;
A swift, sweet hour of living in Time's young paradise;
An age of woman's waiting with anguish in her eyes;

A screaming rage of battle beyond the sullen sea;
A surge of women's weeping in hopeless threnody—
But yesterday my candles brought holy peace to me.

Afar, beyond their glimmer, I saw a rainbow shine,
Where Light, through tears reflected gave Hope its promised sign,
And now I know the harvest of life shall yet be mine!

My gods? Massed valley-lilies and Sharon's roses red;
A spray of flowering olive, a dream of poet dead;
Deep chords of perfect music expressed from hearts that bled;

Dear June days, flaming autumns, by youth's fleet footsteps trod,
All, all, like flowers eternal, swift sprung from Aaron's rod,
Proclaim, at last, One Living and everlasting God!

Hillsboro, Ohio. HELEN FURSELL-ROADS.

But immediately it is added:

> "Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which can not be measured nor numbered.
> "And it shall come to pass that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God.
> "Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land, for great shall be the day of the seed of God."

Here is a recurrence to all that Amos has said before, but the details added here, which are not in the earlier prophet, include the reference to the numerical increase of the nation in the latter days, the reunion of the two kingdoms in one again, and the one head over both.

And so Hosea continues in the discourses following, going over the same ground again and again, ever recurring to his theme, adding here a little and there a little, like an artist filling out a picture with his brush, until at length he concludes the whole with that grand and comforting message in the last chapter of the book, corresponding with, and recurring to, the same in the last chapter of Amos:

"I will heal their backsliding;
I will love them freely;
For mine anger is turned away from them.
I will be as the dew unto Israel."

IV

PERHAPS Isaiah furnishes the richest example of this law of recurrence to be found in any single book of the prophets. His earliest message is comprehended in chapter 1, whose outline includes an indictment against the Israel of his day (2–9); a warning (10–15); an exhortation (16–20), and the customary promise of purification and blessing for the nation in the time to come (21–27).

Observe, however, that the period of time covered by this first message is inclusive of all his messages or prophecies to the end of the book. Look at the second message in confirmation of this, which is comprehended in chapters 2–4. It begins indeed at the point where the first message concludes, i. e., when Israel is seen purified and blessed in her beloved Jerusalem in the coming age (2 : 1–5). But immediately the prophet recurs once more to his own time, to point out in detail the sin and transgression which prevented the realization of that blessing now.

They were more idolatrous than the heathen of the east, they were in league with demoniacal powers, they were intermarried with the Gentiles, they were unrighteously rich and lofty and haughty in consequence, they were beating God's people to pieces and grinding the faces of the poor, and the day of the Lord was surely coming upon them.

The daughters of Zion are singled out, the women with their "stretched-forth necks and wanton eyes," their chains and bracelets, their mantels and wimples, their "changeable suits of apparel," who would be found at length desolate and sitting upon the ground.

But still that other day was coming, the day when "the branch of the Lord would be beautiful and glorious," the day when the filth of the daughters of Zion should be purged "by the spirit of judgment and by the spirit of burning," the day when the Lord would "create upon every dwelling-place of Mount Zion a cloud and a smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night, for above all the glory shall be a covering."

Thus we have the very same outline of truth as in the first message, the very same indeed as in Hosea and Amos, the very same that will be found throughout the whole range of the prophets not only in the Old Testament, but even from Moses to John.

Recurring to our former article, we find, therefore, that all Old Testament prophecy revolves around these three points, or is found within the circle they describe:

(1) The temporal and spiritual blessings God would bestow upon Israel and Judah, if obedient and faithful;

(2) The judgment certain to fall upon them if they failed to be obedient and faithful;

(3) The restored and renewed blessing that would be theirs when, at a later time, they should through penitence and faith become obedient and faithful.

Concrete Roads and Roast Beef

Gentlemen:

The stock raisers in this vicinity deliver to the Stock Yards an average of 300 motor trucks loads of calves, sheep and hogs daily. From the information we have these trucks are operated economically on concrete roads.

A large majority of the stock raised in Central Indiana comes from within a radius of fifty miles and is delivered to us by motor trucks over hard surfaced roads. The advantage of this to Indianapolis is apparent, and every shipper appreciates the economic way in handling live stock.

Yours very truly.

THE BELT RAILROAD AND

SER:SEG

THIS load of roast beef — live stock from farms in the vicinity of Indianapolis, Ind. — is on its way over one of the concrete roads of Marion County to the Indianapolis stockyards.

Before the combination of motor trucks and concrete roads existed in Marion Co., farmers in the vicinity of Indianapolis had to sell live stock to dealers, who bought enough cattle in the neighborhood to make a carload for shipment to Indianapolis.

What the concrete roads leading to Indianapolis have done for stock raisers is best told by Joseph Jackson, one of the prominent farmers of Lebanon, Indiana.

Read What He Says:

"During the past few months concrete roads have enabled me to ship live stock direct to the yards by motor truck, eliminating the middle man and saving me his profit.

"It also saves shrinkage in weight of the cattle, caused by loading, shipping and unloading from freight cars, and I can ship as often as I have stock ready for the market, without waiting to get together a carload: which often makes it necessary to include animals still under full weight.

"Shipping by truck would be expensive over poor roads and often impossible. Over concrete you can keep your trucks going the year round, with the least wear and tear and with a minimum of gasoline.

"Concrete roads and motor trucks are and will be hereafter a great aid to the farmer shipping produce and live stock to market."

S. E. Rauh, President of the Belt Railroad & Stockyards Co., Indianapolis, also has something to say about shipment of live stock by motor truck into Indianapolis. Read his letter, too.

You see that roast beef may depend on concrete roads—that roads are a great factor in regular distribution of food products.

Read again the second paragraph of Mr. Jackson's letter above. It gives some of the reasons why

Questions and Answers

M. K., Johnstown, Pa. The statement you quote that "as for grammar and spelling in the greatest age of English literature, neither was understood and no writer could be trusted either in spelling or in grammar," is rather a loose one. In the days of Chaucer there were undoubtedly differences among writers which made their grammar and spelling seem singular to us; yet crude though they were, the art of literary composition was well advanced. That, however, was not the greatest age; it came in the Elizabethan period; and while the literary peculiarities of Shakespeare's style were strongly defined, it could not be said in any sense that they revealed lack of knowledge in either grammar or spelling, the standards of that day being suited to the culture of the time. And a great advance had been made over the days of Chaucer. In the days of Addison, Johnson, Swift, Congreve and Goldsmith, we find a great advance with more unity in both grammar and spelling. The Authorized Version of the Bible in the line of literary workmanship noted the greatest advance of all, and reached a point which has not been surpassed if indeed equaled. There was a certain latitude in spelling, it is true, to which we today look back with interested curiosity; but even that was not the result of ignorance, but rather of custom, which allowed the latitude, and it was in no sense a literary disfigurement.

W. M. Moore, San Diego, Calif., sends this timely thought by way of a helpful suggestion in the cause of Church Unity: "I have been very much interested in reading over the replies of many of your correspondents as to the probable change in the Church of today as a result of the enlightenment of the war. It has seemed to me for some years that the true basis of the Christian Church is love. As God is love, and love the fulfilling of the law, do you not think this simple Christian love should be the corner-stone of the Church to come? Perhaps its simplicity has been one reason why it has been overlooked. To my mind the efforts to bring in so many dogmas has led to the present discord. Let love reign and all else will follow. Let us go in heartily for democracy, which, as I see it, is or ought to be love exemplified. Establish the Church on the broad principle of love as God intended and as Christ taught, and there can be no failure."

J. W. H., Arcanum, Va., writes. "In your issue of December 25, Miss Sangster tells of her proposed trip to Europe in the interest of Christian Herald readers. One short sentence—five words—of hers carries with it more of truth and fact as to the mooted question 'Who won the wár?' than pages and volumes of would-be judges; for most of these last are partisan, according to the nationality of the speaker or writer. Miss Sangster says. 'It seems hardly possible that I shall see Belgium—the Belgium that saved the world.' The truth in a nutshell; for had not that devoted little kingdom held back by her intrepid warriors the German war machine (then believed invincible) throughout those fifteen blood-soaked days in August, 1914, France would have been overrun, Paris would have been taken, the channel ports would have been captured, and England would have been helpless to cross over the straits of Dover with an army—and per consequence America too. Laud America, England, France, Italy to the limit—they all did nobly—but to the writer, the brave Belgians in those fifteen first fateful days, made it possible—and this alone—for the Allies and America to crush Germany."

Chester B. Manning, Camp Funston, Kansas, writes: "I am a secretary at a Y. M. C. A. at Camp Funston, and lately have enjoyed talking to the soldiers and showing them curios from South America which I obtained while a missionary there, using these curios as an object-lesson. Many of these have been put in panels and lessons written beneath them, so that the soldiers may look at them and learn from them at leisure. This material I find very good, for it holds the attention while I preach to them of Jesus Christ. I have also used them in public schools with thousands of children with good telling effect. More curios of an interesting kind would be welcomed here as time drags slowly with these dear soldier boys. This is a permanent, demobilization camp, so the curios could be used right along with good effect. It is only such curios as I could use as object lessons that are desired, so I would request that any of your readers having some curios to donate would first drop me a card, telling me what they have, as it is only a certain class I could use."

It may interest some of our readers to try to cooperate with this earnest worker, and if they have any curios which they could donate to the work, the gift would be appreciated.

Mrs. L. M. P., Storden, Minn. There is no record in existence to show that the Russians, at any time during the war, ever maltreated the Germans in any territory through which the Russian armies passed. France and England have invariably conducted themselves according to the accepted usages of civilized warfare. Germany and Austria, however, have been proved guilty of unheard-of barbarities, and have wantonly destroyed life and property. It should be remembered, also, that the excesses committed by the Bolsheviki in Russia, and also by the Turks, were shown to have been due, to a very large extent, to German instigation, and in some cases were done with actual German cooperation.

Personal to Our Readers

"J. M. D., Portland, Oregon. Could you give me information whether there is a first-class War book either published or in preparation? I mean a picturesque story of the great World-War, not a mere chronology."

Our Book Department has received other letters similar to the above, inquiring about a History of the Great War. It is yet too early to complete such a book. The Peace Conference must first be concluded before such a work could be regarded as practicable. The Christian Herald would be glad to know how many of its readers would wish to have copies of such a book, and it invites all who are interested to send us a postal on the subject. The book must of course be a really first-class work, both in the literary sense and in the accuracy and authoritative character of the text. The illustrations should be the best obtainable, and the book should contain colored maps showing the territorial changes produced by the War. This is not possible until the conference defines the new national boundaries. We feel, however, that if a sufficient number of requests are received, we would be justified in going ahead with the preparation of a volume such as we have had in mind for some time past. It would be invaluable to our readers and to every one wishing to possess accurate information on the War and its results. Such a book could be provided for $2.00, postpaid, and would be a good-sized, handsome volume. It should be remembered that the geographies and atlases now existing will be absolutely out of date owing to the War. Let those who desire to own such a book as we have indicated write us today. Send no money now. Address: Book Department, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Mrs. S. T. L., Long Beach, Calif., with reference to L. A. F., Plaindealer, La., writes: "Over seventy years ago, when a young girl, we used to sing of 'Napoleon on St. Helena.' Here is one verse of it. There may have been more verses, but the following is all that I can recall:

"On a lone barren isle, where the loud roaring billows
 Assail the stern rock and the loud tempests rave,
The hero lies still, while the dim drooping willows,
 Like fond weeping mourners, bend over his grave.
The lightning may flash and the loud thunders rattle,
 He hears not, he heeds not, he's free from all pain.
He sleeps his last sleep, he has fought his last battle;
 No sound can awake him to glory again!"

E. S. E., Springfield, Tenn., writes: "Permanent peace is to be had here on earth only by the individual who will yield to the suggestion and control of the Holy Spirit. It is impossible for the physical man to devise any plan that will produce entire satisfaction and continuous perfect peace. Man's mind is wonderful in its ingenuity and productive power. It masters things material, and by force can control the physical man, and in this way he is able to protect society and to enable people to enjoy freedom. When our Allies execute their plan to establish a real democracy, establishing a democratic form of government for the whole world, all people will enjoy their freedom, and the oppression of the poor and ignorant will cease to a certain extent; but permanent peace cannot exist without the operation of the Holy Spirit. This perfect permanent peace is to be had only by continuous prayer—that is, the mind and heart must be continuously in a prayerful state. 'It is within the power of an individual to enjoy permanent peace. The Holy Spirit is ever ready. May we come to the full realization that God is not far away; that he is with us every minute, patiently waiting for us to take him into our life."

Miss V. A. L., Brokenburg, Va. To secure a loan from the government for farm improvements, you should take the matter up with the Farm Loan Board of the United States Treasury Department, address New York Avenue and Fourteenth Street, Washington, D. C.

Mrs. M. M. H., Holland, Va. We wish we could give the information you desire, but the question is a difficult one. Very many have doubtless been asking how the Allies could feed, guard and shelter the immense numbers of prisoners captured from the Central Powers—many thousands at a time. It does seem a tremendous undertaking; yet we have no doubt that the Allied commissariat was equal to the occasion. Certainly, even the most irregular minimum of food would be better than no supply at all—which seems to have been the situation in some of the sections of the German army during its grand retreat.

Subscriber, Barneston, Quebec. The use of the word "husband" for household in the Guide to International Sunday School Lessons probably originated in a slip of the pen in preparing the Guide for the press. The correct rendering is, of course, "household," as in all parallel passages. "This incident shows," says a prominent divine to whom we referred the matter, "how it happens that we have so many variant readings in the ancient manuscripts of the Bible. It makes one realize how providentially the essential message of the Scriptures has been handed down through the frail humanity that has copied and recopied its text."

Mrs. E. H., Rowley, Iowa. Your letter has been referred to Dr. Gray, author of the articles on Prophecy now running in the Christian Herald.

E. D. C., Hamilton, Mont. The transportation of our American troops was accomplished largely with the aid of extensive cooperation by the Allies, the British and French together carrying nearly one-half of the whole number the other half, or slightly more, being carried in American troopships, merchant vessels and private yachts of good capacity, which were put at the Government's disposal. The statement you quote is an exaggeration and misleading. Private citizens did their share nobly, but it was only a small part of the whole. Our Government took over a vast amount of merchant shipping from different steamship lines, especially for that purpose.

A. H., Mishawaka, Ind. Life is a gift from God and ought to be treasured. Pain and suffering, loss and disappointment are to be accepted as discipline, if we regard them rightly. Two familiar passages in the Bible which are often quoted against suicide are Paul's advice to the Philippian jailer when he was about to kill himself (Acts 16 :28), and Job's declaration: "all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come" (Job 14 : 14), spoken when both his friends and his wife had urged him to self-destruction. Stronger than either is the familiar passage in Matt. 16 : 26. Even the attempt at suicide is a crime under human law. In the early church, suicide was repudiated and punished by refusal of Christian burial.

Spiritual Habits

SUNDAY, February 2. Ps. 62 : 8. "Trust in the Lord at all times." I Thess. 5 : 17. "Pray without ceasing." I Thess. 5 : 18. "In everything give thanks." Every student of the criptures knows how constantly we are counseled nd commanded to seek the strength and security spiritual habits. It is only in formal, fixed habits at life finds its strongholds, whether they be strong-olds of virtue or of vice. As long as anything ex-esses itself brokenly, infrequently, irregularly, we e in a state of weakness, and we are exposed to the saults of the enemy. It is when our separate acts ve matured into a permanent attitude, when the liberate posture has become an abiding disposition, at we enter the realm of spiritual rest and fortitude. hen we have always to painfully think about doing ings we are in bondage; when things come, as were, to do themselves, we have gained our free-om.

There is the habit of trust. We are bidden to culti-ate the habit of confidence in God. We are deliber-ely to practice such confidence until the action be-mes instinctive; that is to say, until the action ecomes an attitude. And we are to be especially ligent in the practice in seasons when circumstances em to be hostile or indifferent.

And then there is the habit of prayer. That also surely the attainment of a spiritual posture. This nd of prayer is not merely the communion of speech, ough it includes it. We cannot be always speaking, ut we can be always praying. Ceaseless prayer is e prayer of mental inclination. It is prayer ripened to an instinctive habit.

And then there is, finally, the habit of praise. It gins in counting one's blessings. It is the cultiva-on of an eye for the divine footprints along the roads drudgery and ordinary work. And in this deliber-e way we cultivate the habit of praise, the tokens providence unveil themselves like an unbroken ne of light, and the heart follows the line with in-inctive song. We are moving toward a fruitful curity when we are moving in the pathway that ads to spiritual habit. J. H. J.

The Conquest of the World

MONDAY, February 3. I John 5 : 4. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our ith." General Grant once described a certain army e saw on his trip around the world as "marching ith the swing of conquest." Those who saw our rst American troops passing through London a few onths ago declare that they had the easy swinging ait of men who are accustomed to overcoming atural obstacles, of souls who walk the earth as those ho have already won it. There is a great difference etween the physical appearance of one who has ought victoriously and of one who has failed to ght or who has been beaten. The one is erect and roud, the other hangs his head in sorrow if not in ame. It was the exultant cry of a man like Brown-g, who was "ever a fighter," toward the end of a ng and heroic life, "I have had a good time; I have ad a lot of fun in the fighting." Pacifism changes ght to flight. Militancy changes flight to fight. Life a conflict. "Fightings and fears within, without." ne of the bravest men on earth said, as he laid his and on the cold face of a friend in his casket, a friend ho had successfully retrieved a moral character hich had been weakened by bad habits, a friend ho had "fought with wild beasts at Ephesus," "You ere a good soldier, Robert." And he was. Life ust be deep as well as long. It must be broad and igh. But first of all it must be brave. The crown f life is theirs alone who achieve victory in contest ith the forces which challenge the human spirit.

The Lord's Prayer

TUESDAY, February 4. Luke 11 : 2, 4. "When ye pray, say, Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name, Thy kingdom come. Thy will e done, as in heaven, so in earth. Give us day by day ur daily bread. And forgive us our sins; for we also orgive every one that is indebted to us. And lead us not nto temptation; but deliver us from evil." The Lord's Prayer, which Jesus taught his disciples by request, is uch an all-satisfying prayer because, first, it puts us n a right relation to our God. We come to him boldly nd with all confidence and speak to him as dear children speak to their Father. Next, it places our primary interests in this life first. That God's name be hallowed among men, by the right teaching of his Word and the holy life of his followers; that his kingdom of righteousness should be firmly established in our hearts by his Holy Spirit through faith, and that it should be spread throughout the world; that with the angels in heaven we should join in hearty and continuous efforts to execute his good and gracious will, doing what he wants us to do, shunning what he wants us to shun, and suffering for his name's sake whatever in his wisdom he causes or permits us to suffer—these are the things essential to our spiritual life. Lastly, the prayer does not neglect our temporal and physical wants. All that we need to support this body and life we ask of his great bounty, and as the various needs may arise from day to day. But over and above our daily bread we have greater necessities, remembering that we have to live in a world that is full of evil, a world in which even the righteous man falls seven times a day, and where occasions for being turned from the right path are numerous until we quit this earth. Against these forces of wickedness God is to provide the daily and hourly protection, remove our own guilt again and again, and give us the grace to forgive as he forgives; thwart all the onslaughts of the devil upon our faith, and bring us safely out of all our troubles at the end of our pilgrimage. W. H. T. D.

The Love of Freedom

WEDNESDAY, February 5. Heb. 6 : 12. "Be ye followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." It is well to follow our great leaders as they follow Christ. Christianity incarnated and illustrated in personality is far more fascinating than all abstract creeds or doctrines. America's great Christian Presidents have exerted a wide influence upon the world. They have been the people's representatives, to whom we have looked for guidance, who have grown stronger and grander by translation into the life eternal.

Abraham Lincoln was a shepherd of humanity. He led a people up from the wilderness of slavery toward the fruitful Canaan of liberty, equality and independence. His name is a psalm of praise the world around, a name that stands for patriotism, duty, justice and truth.

We have been fighting to make the new day he ushered in for America as wide as the world. His spirit animates our country today as we seek to make freedom supreme and to banish wrong and oppression to oblivion. He had the spirit of his divine Master, showing mercy and charity toward enemies, justice for the incorrigible, and giving universal peace to the world.

A nation that loses liberty loses everything in this world. As Christ has made sure freedom of the soul from sin, so the nation should stand for freedom of thought, action and the possession of rights. History has been a struggle against the rule of tyrannical, one-man power. We are now seeing the dawn of a new day, in which bondage will be broken forever and loving and serving one another may become the motto for the "league of nations" that will compel the peace of the world. E. W. C.

One Thing Needful

THURSDAY, February 6. Luke 10 : 41, 42. "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things: but one thing is needful: and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her." Was the Lord displeased with his hostess? The tenor of his remarks would seem to indicate this. It is a friendly address, but it contains a warning. The ground for this warning, however, is not what Martha had been doing since Jesus came to her home. The law of hospitality is regarded by Scripture as a sacred law. Martha was eager to meet fully the duties of hostess on this occasion. She wished to do the honors of her house well: she wanted not only to make her distinguished guest comfortable, but also to show him how much his visit was appreciated. What, then, was it that the Lord considered faulty in her conduct? It was her disposition and temper. In the first place, she wanted to make the reception accorded to Jesus grand, and in doing so overtaxed her strength. In the second place, she was vexed at her sister, who in her judgment was doing nothing to entertain the Lord, and yet the Lord seemed more pleased with Mary than with herself. She could not refrain from making remarks which showed that she was irritated. There was a little vainglory, a little jealousy, and a little crossness such as a bustling housekeeper at times allows herself to fall into, mixed up in this scene. The Savior's answer sets her right in a few words. He says there is but one thing needful. Needful for what? Why, for a proper reception of himself. To receive Jesus aright one must be willing to receive from him. He comes always to give rather than to receive. And he has things to give which cannot be obtained from anyone else. He has the words of eternal life, which faith craves to receive from him. W. H. T. D.

Streams in the Desert

FRIDAY, February 7. Isa. 35 : 6. "For in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert." One characteristic of the desert is its dreadful monotony. Those who have seen the Sahara or the Arabian Desert know what this means. Those who have crossed the great Western plains know. Far as the eye can see there is the same wide stretch of blistering sand and sun-scorched soil. Interminable stretches of sage-brush. Sand-storms that fill the air with hot sand. Vastness of gray desolation. Bleached skeletons of beasts that have perished of hunger and thirst. Life has its desert experiences. Some lives are always gray and monotonous, and all lives have their desert-like aspects. But, says the prophet, there shall be streams in the desert. The desert places of our lives shall have their oases, their garden-spots. We can endure the desert if only here and there we may find palms and fountains.

Of all dreary lives, perhaps those of the poor in our great cities are the dreariest. It was a woman on the East Side of New York, living in a cheap tenement house, who said to a physician, "I must get away from this yellow wall-paper or I shall go mad." It had come to pass that the surface of that hideous wall covering represented to her tired brain the whole scope of her life. It must be so of one whose work, year after year, opens upon no window of beauty. Some lives are desperately dull. But they found streams in the desert. They discovered a light above the brightness of the sun glorifying potato fields and carpenter shops, transfiguring meadows and forests. It was revealed to Millet and Corot, and they revealed to others, the wealth of interest there may be in lives that seem all desert. It is clearly God's will that whatever our lot may be, wherever the lines of our lives may be cast, we should not be strangers to the high fellowships of the saints and to the plans and purposes of God. Our desert way is God's way, gray and desolate though it may be, and if it be so, it can never be forsaken or forgotten by him. Where duty calls us, where providence has placed us, there are streams whose source is in the very nature of God himself. C. C. A.

Friend of the Oppressed

SATURDAY, February 8. Philemon 10. "I beseech thee for my son Onesimus, whom I have begotten in my bonds." 17. "Receive him as myself." Paul pleads that a runaway slave may be received by his master as a brother beloved, yea, even as Philemon would receive the apostle Paul himself. Paul believed that all men were of one blood, the offspring of the Almighty, and were all made one in Christ Jesus. Clarkson, the abolitionist, was once asked, "Are you not afraid of neglecting your own soul amid your constant labors for the negro?" He replied, "I leave God to take care of my soul while I do his work."

The grandest acts of the heroes of the past have been their efforts for the freedom of the enslaved. Freedom is one of the most precious words in human language, national freedom and freedom in the kingdom of Jesus Christ. This is the watchword of the hour.

Abraham Lincoln's spirit is today the flaming torch of Liberty Enlightening the World, and his present successor is spreading the glorious flame of freedom among all the nations of the world.

It is a matter of history that on the evening of September 22, 1862, President Lincoln sat with the Proclamation of Emancipation before him, all ready for his signature. His whole life had been devoted to freedom. In his young manhood, while attending an auction of slaves in New Orleans, he said to himself, "If I ever have a chance to hit that thing, I will hit it hard." Now the opportunity to strike off the fetters of four million slaves was before him. Through the long hours of a sleepless night he hesitated, saying, "Is this the hour? Is this the best way to freedom? Will it help the Union cause? Is it God's will?" At last, as the morning was breaking, he wrote on that immortal document, "Abraham Lincoln." All our martyred President ever wished to know was, "Is this the will of God and the hour to act?" It would not have changed his decision if he had known that the bullet of an assassin would send him to his death. To him dying was glorious after such an act of humanity. E. W. C.

The Search

CHAPTER VI

THERE was no way to escape meeting Wainwright. John Cameron knew that with the first glance. He also knew that Wainwright had recognized him at once and was lifting his chin already with that peculiar, disagreeable tilt of triumph that had always been so maddening to one who knew the small, mean nature of the man.

Of course there was still time to turn deliberately about and flee in the other direction, but that would be all too obvious, and would be an open confession of weakness. John Cameron was never at any time a coward.

His firm lips set a trifle more sternly than usual, his handsome head was held high with fine military bearing. He came forward without faltering for even so much as the fraction of a waver. There was not even a flicker in his eyes set straight ahead. One would never have known from his looks that he recognized the oncoming man, or had so much as realized an officer was approaching, yet his brain was doing some rapid calculation. He had said in his heart, if not openly, that he would never salute this man. He had many times in their home town openly insulted him, as the night when he had passed down the aisle of the same car; but that was a different matter from camp. He knew that Wainwright was in a position here to call others to his assistance, and no longer stood in fear of the good thrashing he had feared when at home. He knew that nothing would delight the young snob more than to humiliate his sworn enemy here at camp, where he felt himself safe from reprisals, and that he would not hesitate for a moment to call him down, to report him, or even to represent him falsely so that he would be put in the guardhouse; yet Cameron walked on, knowing that he was not going to salute Lieutenant Wainwright. It was not merely pride in his own superiority. It was contempt for the nature of the man that gave him a sense of being justified in his attitude toward another fellow creature. He had from boyhood caught the other in too many contemptible plots and tricks not to despise him. Almost from babyhood they had been sworn enemies on a basis of right against wrong, although Right did not always use the Golden Rule in executing what he conceived to be justice. Nevertheless he had thus far been champion. "He is nothing but a Hun at heart," he told himself bitterly.

BUT the tables were turned. Wainwright was no longer in the home town, where his detestable pranks had goaded many of his neighbors and fellow townsmen into a cordial hatred of him. He was in a great military camp, vested with a certain amount of authority, with the right to report those under him, who in turn could not retaliate by telling what they knew of him. Cameron of course recognized that these things had to be, in order to maintain military discipline. But it was inevitable that some unworthy ones should creep in. Wainwright was that unworthy one, and Cameron meant not to toady to him, officer or no officer! What did he care what happened to him? Who was there to care? His mother would understand, and even if the news should penetrate to the home town that he was in the guardhouse, the few who knew him would understand. To those who did not know him it would not matter. There was no one to really care. Stay! A letter crackled in his breast pocket, and a cold chill of horror struggled up from his heart and strangled around his throat. Suppose she should hear of it! Yes, he would care for that!

They were almost meeting now, and Cameron's eyes were straight ahead, staring hard at the big green shape of the camp theater a quarter of a mile away. His face under its usual control showed yet no sign of the tumult in his heart which flamed with a sudden despair against a fate that placed him in such a desperate situation. If there was a Power that controlled the details of men's lives how could it let such things happen to one who had always tried to live an upright life? Who, however unsuccessful in living himself, had always championed the downtrodden, and stood for fairness and justice? It seemed for that instant as if all the unfairness and injustice of his own hard life had culminated in that one moment as he walked steadily on to the moment when he would have to do, or not do, and bear the consequences.

THEN suddenly out from the barracks close at hand with brisk step and noble bearing came Captain LaRue, swinging down the walk into the road straight between the two men, and stopped short in front of Cameron with a light of real welcome in his eyes as he lifted his hand to answer the salute which the relieved corporal instantly flashed at him.

In that second Lieutenant Wainwright flung past, with a curt salute to the higher officer and a glare at the corporal which the latter seemed not to see. It was so simultaneous with Cameron's salute to LaRue that nobody on earth could say that the salute had not included the lieutenant; yet both the lieutenant and the corporal knew that it had not, and Wainwright's brow was dark with intention as he turned sharply up the walk to the barracks which the captain had just left.

"I was just coming in search of you, Cameron," said the older man with a kindly twinkle in his eyes, and his voice was clearly distinct to Wainwright as he lingered on the barrack steps to listen. "I went down to Washington yesterday as I promised and saw our friend. I put in the strongest plea I knew how for you, and I hope the transfer will go through. There's no one else out for the job that I know of, and you are just the man for the place. It will be a great comfort to me to have you with me."

Just those few ringing words, spoken clearly, heartily, with pleasant comradeship in the voice, and the busy man, smilingly eluding Cameron's earnest thanks, moved on his way, leaving Cameron to pursue his course toward the Y. M. C. A. hut with a soothing sense of comfort and relief. It never occurred to either of them that their brief conversation had been overheard, and would not have disturbed them if it had. Lieutenant Wainwright had lingered on the steps of the barracks, high above them, almost hidden because of the deep cut in the grading to the street just there, and he listened with a growing curiosity and satisfaction, as was evident from the sneer of his petted little mustache, as he threw away the end of his cigarette and entered the barracks smiling with a sinister gleam in his eye. He had a handle now for the undoing of his enemy, and he meant to use it. In fact, his two enemies; for he hated Captain LaRue as sin always hates the light.

HE LOUNGED about a few minutes smoking and thinking, with his little eyes narrowed balefully. Presently he made a careful toilet and went out again.

He knew exactly where to go, and how to use his influence, which was not small, although not personal. It was characteristic of the man that it made no difference to him that the power he was wielding was a borrowed power whose owner would have been the last man to have done what he was now doing with it. He had never in his life hesitated about getting what he wanted by whatever means presented itself. Indeed, he may have been aware that often people gave him what he wanted merely to get rid of him; though this did not in the least alloy his pleasure in his achievement.

Lieutenant Wainwright was somewhat of a privileged character in the high place to which he betook himself, on account of the supreme regard for the uncle through whose influence young Wainwright had obtained his commission. He had not so far availed himself of his privileges too often, and therefore not outworn his welcome, for he was sometimes a diplomat. He entered in this evening with just the right shade of delicate assurance and humble effrontery to assure him a cordial welcome, and gracefully settled himself into the friendliness that was readily extended to him. He was versed in all the ways of the world, and when he chose could put up a good appearance. He knew that for the sake of his father's family, and more especially because of his uncle's high standing, this great official whom he was calling upon was bound to be nice to him for a time. So he bided his time till a few other officials had left and his chance came.

THE talk was all personal, a few words about his relatives, and then questions about himself and his commission, how he liked it and how things were going with him. Mere form and courtesy, of course, but the lieutenant knew just how to use the conversation for his own ends:

"Oh, I'm getting along fine and dandy!" he declared in patriotic effusiveness. "I'm just crazy about camp! I like the life! But I'll tell you what makes me tired. It's these little common guys running around fussing about their jobs and trying to get a lot of pull to get into some other place. Now, there's an instance of that in our regiment; a man from my home town, no account whatever, and never was, but he's got it in his head he's a square peg in a round hole, and he wants to be transferred. He shouts about it from morning till night, trying to get everybody to help him, and at last I understand he's hoodwinked one captain into thinking he's the salt of the earth, and they are plotting together to get him transferred. I happened to overhear them talking about it, how they were going to this one and that one in Washington to get things fixed, and just tonight I heard them say they had the right dope on things all right, and it was going through. He'd get his transfer all right. It just makes me sick. He's no more fit for a commission than my dog, not as fit. I've known him since we were kids and never liked him. But he has a way with him that makes people think he is it till they get to know him. It's too bad when the country needs all the real men to do their duty that a fellow like that can hoodwink people into putting him into a place for which he is utterly inefficient. But of course I can't tell anybody what I know about him."

"I guess you needn't worry, Wainwright. They can't make any transfer without sending it up to me, and you may be good and sure I'm not transferring anybody just now without a good reason, no matter who is backing him. He's in your company, did you say? And where does he ask to be transferred? Just give me his name. I'll make a note of it. If it ever comes up I'll know how to squash his hopes pretty suddenly. Though I doubt if it does. People are not pulling wires just now. This is War, and everything means business. However, if I find there has been wirepulling I shall know how to deal with it summarily. It's a court-martial offense, you know."

They passed on to other topics, and Wainwright, with his little eyes gleaming triumphantly, soon took himself out into the starlight, knowing that he had done fifteen minutes' good work and not wishing to outdo it. He strolled contentedly back to officers' headquarters with a more complacent look on his heavy features. He would teach John Cameron to ignore him!

MEANTIME, John Cameron with his head among the stars walked the dusty camp streets and forgot the existence of Lieutenant Wainwright. A glow of gratitude had flooded his soul at sight of the beloved captain, whom he hoped soon to be able to call his captain. Unconsciously he walked with more self-respect as the words of confidence and trust rang over again in his ears. Unconsciously little matters of personal enmity became smaller, of less importance, beside the greater things of life in which he hoped soon to have a real part. If he got this transfer it meant a chance to work with a great man in a great way that would not only help the war but would be of great value to himself in his life after the war, if he were to have a life in this world after the war was over. It was good to have the friendship of a man like Captain LaRue—fine, clean, strong, intellectual, kind, just, human, gentle as a woman, yet stern against all who deviated from the path of right.

The dusk was settling into evening, and twinkling lights gloomed out amid the misty, dust-laden air. Snatches of wild song chorused out from open windows:

"She's my lady, my baby,
She's cock-eyed, she's crazy—"

The twang of a banjo trailed in above the voices, with the sound of scuffling and loud laughter, and broke the thread of the song, leaving "Mary Ann" to soar out alone. Then the chorus took it up once more:

"All her teeth are false
From eating Rochelle salts—"
She's my freckled-faced, consumptive Mary Ann!"

Cameron turned in at the quiet haven of the Y. M. C. A. hut, glad to leave the Babel sounds outside. Somehow they did not fit his mood tonight, although there were times when he could roar out the outlandish gibberish with the best of them. But tonight he was on such a wonderful, sacred errand bent, that it seemed as though he would keep his soul from the touch of rougher things, lest somehow it might get out of tune, and so unfit him for the pleasant task before him.

AND then, when he was seated before the simple desk, he looked at the paper with discontent. True, it was what was provided, and it was good for the purpose; but somehow he would have liked to have better stationery to use for her. To think he was really writing to her! And what was he to say, now that he was really here and ready for the wonderful task! Words seemed to have utterly deserted him. How should he address her?

It was not until he had edged over the end of the bench away from rybody else and taken out the pre- us letter from his breast pocket and d it again that he gained confidence d took up his pen.

"My dear friend—" Why, he would l her his friend, of course; that was at she had called him. And as he ote he seemed to see her again as she in her car by the station the day started away on that long, long trail, d their eyes had met. And looking into her eyes again, he wrote straight m his soul:

"MY DEAR FRIEND: Your letter has t reached me after traveling about weeks. I am not going to try to tell u how wonderful it is to me to have In fact, the wonder began that rning I left home, when you smiled me and waved a friendly farewell. was a great surprise to me. I had t supposed until that moment that u remembered my existence. Why uld you? And it has never been m lack of desire to do so that I failed greet you when we passed upon the eet. I did not think that I, a mere tle hoodlum from your infancy days, d a right to intrude upon your grown- acquaintance without a hint from u that such recognition would be reeable. I never blamed you for not eaking, of course. I simply thought at I had grown out of your memory, was altogether natural. It was in- ed a pleasant experience to see that ht of friendliness in your eyes at the tion that day, and to know it was a l personal recognition and not just patriotic gush of enthusiasm for the ole lot of us shabby draftees just rting out to an unknown future. I nked you in my heart for that little of personal friendliness, but I never pected to have an opportunity to ank you with words, nor to have the endliness last after I had gone away. hen your letter came this morning it re was some pleasant surprise. I ow you have a great many friends, d plenty of people to write letters to, t somehow there was a real note of endliness in your letter, not as if you t felt sorry for me because I had to off to that terrible war and fight and ybe get killed, but a sense of good mradeship. It was as if the condi- ns of the times had suddenly swept ay a lot of the foolish conventions of world, which may all have their d use at times perhaps, but which a time like this are sometimes super- ous, and you had just gravely and eetly offered me an old friend's sym- thy and good will. As such I have ken it and am rejoicing in it.

"Don't make any mistake about s, however. I never have forgotten u, nor the rose. I stole it from the ainwrights' yard after I got done king Chuck, and had a fight with Hal ainwright over it which almost ruined rose and nearly got me expelled m school. Hal told his mother and made a row with the school authori- s. I was a pretty tough little rascal those days, I guess, and needed some kings myself occasionally, no doubt. t I remember I almost lost my nerve en I got back to school and came thin an ace of stuffing the rose in my cket instead of throwing it on your sk when I came in. I never dreamed rose would be anything to you. It s only my way of paying tribute to u. You seemed to me something like ose dropped out of heaven, you know, u were so little and pink and gold, th such big blue eyes. Pardon me. I n't mean to be too personal. You re only a baby then, and I was a great hobbledehoy, but I would have ked any boy in town that lifted a ger or said a word against you. And to ink you really needed my help! It rtainly would have lifted me above clouds if I could have known it en!

"And now about this war business. course it is a rough job, and some- dy had to do it for the world. I was d and willing to do my part, but it akes a different thing out of it to be lled a knight, and I guess I'll look at a little more respectfully now. If a e like mine can protect a life like urs from some of the things those ermans are putting over I'd gladly ve it. I've sized it up that a man couldn't do a bigger thing with his life anyhow he planned it than to make the world safe for a life like yours; so me for what they call 'the supreme sacrifice,' and it won't be any sacrifice at all if it helps you!

"No, I haven't got a sweater or those other things that go with them, that you talk about. Mother hasn't time to knit, and I never was much of a lady's man. I guess you know that if you know me at all. Or perhaps you don't. But anyhow I'd be wonderfully pleased to wear a sweater that you knit for me, although it seems like a pretty big thing for you to do for me. However, if knitting is your job in this war, and I wouldn't be robbing any other better fellow, I certainly would just love to have it.

"If you could see this big dusty monotonous olive-drab camp you would know what a bright spot your letter and the thought of a real friend has made in it. I suppose you have been thinking all this time that I didn't care about it because I didn't answer, but it was all the fault of somebody having given you the wrong address. I am hoping that you will forgive the long delay and that some day you will have time to write to me again.

"Very sincerely and proudly,
"Your knight,
"JOHN CAMERON."

AS HE walked back to his barracks under the starlight his heart was filled with a great peace and uplift. What a thing it was to have been able to speak to her on paper and let her know his thoughts of her! It was as if after all these years he had been able to pluck another trifling rose and lay it at her lovely feet. Her knight! It was the fulfilment of all his boyish dreams!

He had entrusted his letter to the Y. M. C. A. man to mail as he was going out of camp that night, and he would mail it in Baltimore, ensuring it an immediate start. Now he began to speculate whether it would reach its destination by morning and be delivered with the morning mail. He felt as excited as a child over it.

Suddenly a voice above him rang out with a familiar guffaw, and the words: "Why man, I can't! Didn't I tell you I expect to marry Ruth Macdonald before I go? There wouldn't be time!"

Something in his heart grew cold with pain and horror, and something in his motive power stopped suddenly and halted his feet on the sidewalk in the grade cut below the officers' barracks.

"Aw! A week more won't make any difference," drawled another familiar voice. "I say, Hal, she's just crazy about you, and you could get no end of information out of her if you tried. All she asks is that you tell what you know about a few little things that don't matter."

"But I tell you I can't, man! If Ruth found it out there would be a pretty kettle of fish. She wouldn't stand for another girl—not that sort, you know—and there wouldn't be time for me to smooth things over before I go across the Pond."

The barracks door slammed shut on the voices, and Corporal Cameron's heart gave a great jump upward in his breast and went on. Slowly, dizzily he came to his senses, and moved on automatically toward his own quarters.

THE Seamen's Church Institute, located at 25 South Street, New York City, extended a unique welcome to the returned battle squadron. The Institute's tender was gaily decorated with flags and electric lights, while on the rear deck stood a large Christmas tree. About forty singers, under the direction of Mr. Frederick Weld, musical director of the Navy Y. M. C. A. War Activities, sang Christmas carols and popular songs as each vessel was reached. The tender was illuminated by the searchlights of the serenaded vessels. Each of the grim sentinels of the deep was greeted with rousing cheers. Notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, the boys tumbled out of their hammocks and rubbed their astonished eyes as they gazed on the strange but welcome sight.

USED WHILE YOU SLEEP

Established 1879

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs.

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs.

Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold.

Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp."

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights.

It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers.

For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities.

It is a protection to those exposed.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 39 years of successful use.

Marion Harland's Corner

Motherly Chat With Perplexed Members

"I LIVE near a family in which is a little boy who had infantile paralysis some months ago. It has left his legs in a very bad condition. He falls often and strikes his head on the hard floor, and nearly breaks his skull. He is quite willful and wants his own way, and cries a great deal. Those who have the care of him spank him hard for it. They are good to him in every other way. But is it right for a man to spank him? or is it right to spank him at all? I think it cruel! I should like to hear what Christians and doctors think of this way of treating a child in such a condition, and what the Corner would advise in the circumstances. The little fellow is nothing to me in one way, and I have no right to interfere with his natural guardians; but I see a good deal of him, and my heart aches with pity. Don't misunderstand me in one thing! The child is not whipped for falling, but for crying and fretting, and for willful disobedience. And I know his parents think they are doing right in disciplining him in this way. If he were strong and well perhaps it would be all right."—R. E. M. (Pennsylvania.)

The worst thing that can be done for a delicate, nervous child is to beat it. You ask if it is right for a man to "spank" a child at all? For years I have inclined to the belief that a man—be he father, or stranger, or teacher—should never "spank" a little child. Not one man in a thousand knows how heavily his great hand falls upon the tender body—especially if he be angry when he strikes. And let me say here, that a vast majority of parents are out-of-temper when they administer bodily chastisement. My soul revolts at the thought of the cruelty practised in the name of duty and justice by the hasty shower of blows upon the offender—often before he is really fully aware of the nature of his transgression. "First the lash, and then the law!" ceases to be an exaggeration in such a case. It is, instead, a biting satire upon Family Government.

Over fifty years ago, this truth was branded upon my mind by the sight of black-and-blue bruises left upon the soft flesh of a two-year-old baby by one of the most loving fathers I have ever known. He was a good man, and he meant to be merciful to his boy, who had defied his authority, and slapped his father in the face. Without the remotest suspicion that he was imitating the small fury in feeling and in deed, the father—to borrow a modern phrase—"reversed the currents," and beat the rebel into submission. Another man—a minister of the gospel and right-minded in all his ways—switched a month-old baby with a willow twig for crying lustily and refusing to take his food.

An extreme case? I grant it, but no more cruel than that of latter-day disciplinarians who "spank" the convalescent from infantile paralysis. Corporal punishment is, in a majority of cases, the result of hasty judgment, or unreasoning anger on the part of the chastiser. If the parent would apply to each reported instance of juvenile depravity and defiance of law and order, investigation of all the circumstances, and if guilt be established, administer such punishment as may seem fitting to the offense, deliberately and with obvious regret, much time may be consumed but none wasted. "The severest punishment I ever knew was when I saw my mother wiping away her tears after she had made me stand in the corner for half an hour," was the testimony of one brought up in the fear of the Lord and in strict obedience to the "Commandment with Promise."

"Would you think that a little girl, fourteen years old, would be saved if she died suddenly without time to say anything about dying? This little girl always prayed at night and attended church and Sunday-school whenever possible. She loved God dearly, and said she meant to join the church when she felt as if she could understand God's Word and live up to her duty as a member of the church. What would you think were her chances of Heaven?"—Mrs. C. (Kentucky.)

The question you put to the Corner is so momentous and solemn that I should hesitate as to the expediency of inserting it had not other Christians, from time to time, discussed similar problems in my hearing. We bring to the matter set forth in your little story, serious consideration of the supreme crisis of human life—the time and the manner of leaving it. You will fo

Our Book Table

God and the War

IT IS a strange thought which dwells in the minds of some men that God is responsible for the war. Here is a little book by Rev. Edward S. Drown, professor in the Episcopal Theological School in Cambridge, England (published by the Macmillan Co., New York), the title of which plainly asserts this. Not by any means does the author state the assumption as his own, for his object is to show its fallacy. In the opening chapter his attitude is shown in these words:

"Shocking though these thoughts be, yet they exist all around us in the minds of men today. They are a challenge to all those who believe in the Christian God of love and power. Can we give a reason for the faith that is in us? Can we express that faith in terms that will appeal to our own age? If belief in God is to be maintained, that belief must meet the difficulties which the present world presents to faith.

"Can we retain the belief in God? And if so, must the thought of God be changed to meet the present need? It is a challenge to the Christian Church. To decline the challenge is to turn our backs to the struggle."

It is the age-old problem of evil—the task of reconciling evil with belief in God. But now the world-tragedy has made it an overshadowing problem, bigger than all others. And the Christian thought or conception of God does not do away with but rather intensifies the problem. Here, for instance, we have the chaplains in the Picardy trenches asking the question:

"'Why does God allow all this suffering to go on so long, when if, as you say, he is almighty he could stop it at once; above all, why does he allow such a lot of people who aren't to blame to suffer most?' Such is the question which is being asked by thousands of people in the ranks, and at home."

To reply that God's ways are inscrutable and beyond human solution, does not satisfy the hearts of men. To tell them that we cannot understand, because our limitations permit us to see only a portion of the whole purpose of God, is equally unsatisfactory. The real and only answer that is applicable to a case he finds to be this:

"That God is omnipotent because good is omnipotent; that God is omnipotent because right is omnipotent; that when Jesus said, 'With God all things are possible,' the heart of that saying is that all things are possible for love. God rules the world, not because he holds the scepter of power, but because righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne. . . . We need supremely the belief in God, the belief that God is righteous, and the belief that righteousness is t power that shall rule the world. W

The Bible and the Soldier

By GEORGE W. COOKE

HARLES M. ALEXANDER, the famous song leader, was trying out a new pianist the other day a New York hotel, when a very erested listener stepped up and re- rked: "My word! that is splendid sic!"

'Do you like Gospel music?" asked great songster.

I certainly do," came the reply.

What is your favorite hymn?"

'he stranger named over the hymns liked best, giving special emphasis those his mother had taught him. 'he great chorister explained that with his party of musicians was veling through the Army and Navy ps and cantonments, getting the to sing and "sign up" on the ket Testament League. The nger manifested no little interest said he believed in that kind of k. Mr. Alexander then drew from pocket a photograph of the signed nbership card of President Wilson. I had an hour with the President terday," said the stranger.

aturally Alexander was interested immediately set to work to "sign ' a man who was big enough to e up an hour of the President's e. It wasn't long before he had the he "Henry Ford" affixed to a nbership card, and the great auto- oile maker was duly and authori- vely a member of the Pocket Testa- nt League, an organization of over million members in all parts of the ld, including a million and a half nbers among the soldiers and rs of the United States and the es. The requirements of membership the Pocket Testament League are simple—to carry a Bible or tament on your person, and the ling of a chapter a day. There are 'ees or dues; it is not a Bible reading ety; it is not a Bible propaganda; e are no laws or by-laws; the only gations being to carry and read. course of conversation, Mr. Ford that he and the President had ed to read certain portions of the le and that it was a genuine satis- ion to join with the splendid men he service, as well as the President, this simple way of reading the ptures.

N EMINENT public man recently asked a Y. M. C. A. secretary t the men in the service think of Bible. His answer was, "We can lly get enough to supply the and."

here can be no doubt of the respect reverence the men in the service heir country have for the Bible, and security they feel in carrying and ling it.

ore than a year ago, Charles M. xander and his associates started a tour of the camps. They have ted forty-six of the cantonments, al stations and forts, leading the in Gospel singing and getting the ws to carry and read the Bible. r half a million men have received taments through the combined work Mr. Alexander and the Business 's League of Philadelphia, whose rman is Joseph M. Steele. This iness Men's League has sent a etary to every embarkation camp. he Y. M. C. A. secretaries, as well the secretaries of the Knights of mbus and the Hebrew Welfare, e not been slow to see the results of carrying and reading of the Bible 'estament in some form. At Camp on a few days ago, a Y. M. C. A. etary, a man who had spent more a score of years in the Christian istry, pleaded with Mr. Alexander send one hundred of the leather- nd Testaments to give to the officers.

T CAMP MERRITT a few weeks ago, Alexander asked four men to e to the platform to sing a chorus had been teaching the men. He red a leather-bound Testament—the e kind President Wilson, Secretary sing, Secretary Daniels, Champ k and a score of other big men carry—if they would come and form an impromptu quartette. A dozen sprang to their feet, and four were indiscriminately chosen from the four corners of the big "Y" auditorium. They made a very acceptable quartette, and lustily sang, "Give your heart to Jesus, he is calling you." The secretary who was signing up the volunteer quartette happened to ask each what his religious connection might be. To his surprise he found a Hebrew, a Roman Catholic, a Greek Catholic and a Methodist. Rather a 'mixed' quartette! That will give some idea how much the men think about creeds and dogma. Their great concern is about the stern realities of life and how to live strong courageous lives while living in the midst of sin and temptation. The men are not asking for a new religion; they believe in the Bible and its precepts and feel that the practice of the teachings of the Bible will bring them through all right.

A few months ago, I was traveling on a train from the South, and a splendid young fellow, clad in the uniform of the navy, eagerly clasping a Pocket Testament League worker's hand, said: "You were on the battleship Kansas and signed a bunch of the men to carry the Testament; here is mine, and I can't begin to tell you how much good I have received from reading this book." He then told this story in the presence of several business men. "A couple of weeks ago I was out with the fellows on a short furlough and we were well set for a good time. We were not on a good errand. I happened to reach into my pocket for my handkerchief, when I touched my Testament. I asked the fellows to count me out. I just couldn't go with that book on my person. And I've been a stronger man ever since."

AT ONE of the "gateways"—an embarkation camp—to France, I walked down the aisle of a "Y" service and found a fellow rather dejected-looking. I asked him if he was getting on all right. "Fifty-fifty," he replied. "What do you mean?" "Well," said he, "this is an entirely new game for me, and for the past few weeks I have had some decidedly mixed feelings. There is no neutrality in this game. You must either stand for this Army stuff like a man or take a tumble." I afterward found that this man was a New York banker. The change had been so radical that he was having a hard time finding his feet. I offered him a Testament. "Yes," he said "I'll take it, and I'll make it the rule of my life to read it." On the back cover he found the decision pledge which reads "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that .... who believeth in him, should not perish but have everlasting life." When he came to the blank line he looked at me and said: "Will it be all right if I put my name in that blank space, for I believe that!" He inserted his name with ink, put the Testament in the pocket over his heart, and walked out of the building.

Some volunteer workers went to the Brooklyn Y. M. C. A., and one was assigned to hand the men their mail. A long file of men were passing. Presently one of the volunteers handed a big, stalwart man a letter. He halted. Tears came to his eyes.

"Don't hold up the line, pass on!" some one shouted.

With broken voice he said: "I can't read that letter; it is from my mother, and I got a telegram yesterday from my home in Texas that she is dead; I can't read it." The worker (a woman) handed the man a Testament and directed him to a quiet corner in the building and told him to read the fourteenth chapter of John, and that she would come over to him soon. Later the woman went over. The big Texan greeted her, and with faltering voice said: "Lady, you told me to read my mother's favorite chapter. If this Book was good enough for her it will do for me."

How I Made My New York Cousin Jealous

A Prize Story by a Woman Who Added One Inexpensive Convenience and Made Her Home a Real Home

"I don't believe I can come to Cantonville this Winter Jane, and I will tell you later why."

This was part of a letter I received from my cousin, Frances Preston, and I felt pretty blue until her next letter came, telling me that her father had bought a farm near Kingston and they were all going up there to look the place over at its worst—in the cold Winter Weather.

For years Frances had been coming to visit me regularly during the Christmas holidays. Then her folks moved to New York and I suppose Frances liked the novelty of living in a big city and hated to leave it. I was therefore quite surprised when I heard that they had purchased a farm and were going there to live in the Spring.

You can imagine my pleasure when Frances wrote me three weeks later that she would arrive on the afternoon train. On the same train, strangely enough, there was a large box I had been expecting. I met Frances at the station and asked the drayman to bring the box over the same day.

As soon as we got home, Frances began to tell me about the wonderful farm her dad had purchased and all about their plans for moving out there in the Spring. She said that the farm had practically every city convenience, including electric lights. She told me that they were planning to buy a little automobile so they would never be very far from anywhere. About a half hour afterward the box arrived and Frances was curious to know what it was.

I told her it was a secret and that she would not know until the next day.

When my husband came home, he too saw the box and said, "Well, Jane, the——"

"Don't breathe a word about it now, John, I said. "Set it up after Frances has gone to bed."

Let me explain here that we had lived on a farm for a number of years and had become used to the inconveniences and personal hardships incident to the old unsanitary outhouse. So that when we moved to town and found that the only house we could get was outside the sewer district, we did not mind the inconvenience so much.

Of course, we wanted modern conveniences, but felt that there was nothing else for us but to do without them.

Frances told me later, quite candidly, that one of the reasons she was not anxious to visit me this year, was because of the inconvenience of living in a home without modern sanitary toilet facilities.

The next day I showed Frances how modern genius had perfected a system of sewage disposal which brought city conveniences to every home, no matter how far removed they were from a sewage system. John had set up our new indoor toilet and when Frances saw it, she was skeptical of it from beginning to end. She said, "Why, we wouldn't have that thing in our house." But after she had been there a week she changed her mind completely. I will confess that John and I both were skeptical when we sent in our order, but we felt if there was a chance of its making good, we wanted it, and since we bought it on an ironclad guarantee and 30 days' free trial, we knew we could return it if it did not work out as we expected. We found that it is completely odorless. Of course no plumbing whatever is necessary. No running water is required. All waste is dissolved by a chemical process such as is used today in some of our largest city disposal systems.

Frances said to me, "Jane, you had a lot of nerve to buy that thing without knowing whether or not it would be practical."

"But I didn't, Frances. I saw one exactly like this at a neighbor's and I asked her all about it. She told me they would no more part with it than they would part with their telephones. I asked her for the name of the manufacturer and then wrote them for their catalog. I read the booklet thoroughly when it arrived. I found that these indoor toilets were indorsed by numerous State Boards of Health, by a Surgeon-General of the United States Health Service, and by thousands of home owners throughout the country. I found they were in use on farms, in small towns, and even in homes where there was running water, but where an additional toilet was needed for an invalid or in some remote part of the house. I found that thousands were in use in stores, in schools, in churches, in physicians' offices, in Summer camps, in hospitals, in factories, and in hotels. And I said to myself, 'if they are good enough for others, they are good enough for me.'

"So I sent in my order subject to 30 days' free trial. The guarantee was backed by the entire $100,000 capital of the manufacturer."

Frances did not say much about the indoor toilet, but I knew she was thinking. One day she came to me and said, "Jane, I wish you would give me the name of the people who make those indoor toilets. I am jealous of the convenience it brings to your home, and I am going to make dad put one in our new house at the farm right away. I thought we had a great many conveniences, but I would do without them all for this one convenience you have here."

This all happened two years ago. Of course, Frances has had one of the indoor toilets put into her new home, and is just as pleased with it as we are with ours.

For two years now we have not had the sickness that usually comes with contaminated water—due to polluting of the well by the sewage from the old outhouse. And we are all feeling 100 per cent better than ever before, simply because it is so convenient and easy to attend to nature's demands. And of course, it has been a Godsend when it was needed during the night.

I am writing this, so that all those who are in need of this great modern convenience may know how remarkably satisfactory it has proven in our case and to recommend that every reader who is interested should write to the Federal Sash & Door Company, 1719 Wabash Ave., Kansas City, Mo., for the booklet which contains all the information about this splendid indoor convenience. I suggest that whether you live on a farm or in a small town without running water facilities, or if there is an invalid in your home who cannot travel from one end of the house to the other, even though there is a modern plumbing system in your home, or if you have a store or business of any kind where convenient facilities would be a profitable investment, that you write at once before you forget. You need not write a letter—just mail the form below or write a postal card and the catalog will come by return mail.

(Coupon for Free Book and 30 Days' Free Trial Offer)

FEDERAL SASH & DOOR COMPANY,
1719 Wabash Ave., Kansas City, Mo.

Please send me your free book and 30 Days' Free Trial Offer on the Indoor Toilet for homes without plumbing. This does not obligate me in any way.

CHRISTIAN HERALD SUBSCRIPTION OFFERS

"Jerusalem—It s Redemption and Future"

IT IS only now that the real story of the Redemption of Jerusalem can be told and it is that story which the Christian Herald presents in the book entitled "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future." It tells the story in vivid detail of conditions in the Holy city during the war.

The book reads like the unfolding of a vast drama, one of the grandest ever known. The redemption is not confined to Palestine, but includes all the Bible lands: Syria, Armenia, Arabia, Mesopotamia, the old country of the patriarchs, and even the "Eden Land"—the cradle of the human race. It is a volume which should be in the possession of every Christian man and woman in America, as it is plentifully illuminative of the fulfilment of God's pledge which is being brought about in a remarkable way in our lifetime. Illustrated with fifteen pages of beautiful pictures from the Holy Land.

We will send a copy of "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.00.

We will send a copy of "Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.50.

"Jerusalem—Its Redemption and Future," separately, $1.00 per copy, postpaid.

"Oh, Money! Money!"

By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna," etc.

"OH. MONEY! MONEY!" is a romance of a New England Cinderella and a Western millionaire. "If you don't know how to get happiness out of five dollars, you don't know how to get it out of five thousand," says Maggie, the cheery philosopher of "Oh, Money! Money!" and this is the keynote of Mrs. Porter's latest story. Out of a clear sky came three checks to the three Blaisdell families. How each family tried in its own way to get happiness from its unexpected fortune—and failed; and how poor Maggie, without trying and without a fortune, succeeded, is told in "Oh, Money! Money!"

We will send a copy of "Oh, Money! Money!" postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.00.

We will send a copy of "Oh, Money! Money!" postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.50.

"Oh, Money! Money!" separately, $1.50 per copy, postpaid.

"Light on Prophecy"

Report of the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY" links up the prophecies of the Bible with the great events of today and shows conclusively that we are living in an age of prophetic fulfilment. When we set out several months ago to print "Light on Prophecy," we felt that it was a book which our readers would welcome. It held something that very many good people want to know. The result, however, far exceeded our expectations. "Light on Prophecy" has now passed through four large editions, and the demand is still growing. The book contains all the notable addresses on prophecy delivered at the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference, which was the most important gathering of its kind ever held in this country or perhaps in the world.

We will send a copy of "Light on Prophecy," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.00.

We will send a copy of "Light on Prophecy," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us ONE NEW yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.50.

"Light on Prophecy," separately, $1.00 per copy, postpaid.

Killing a Million Armenians

Ambassador Morgenthau's Revelations

AS GERMANY is now suing for peace, it is important that the world should know some things she has tried to keep secret.

This inside history and much more, all significant and breathlessly interesting, is in "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story." This book tells why the Turks killed 1,000,000 Armenians and fixes on the Germans the responsibility for the atrocities. It reveals the perfidy of Germany's attempt to start a holy war against Christians. It is the kind of a book that keeps one reading on and on. It is entertainingly written, yet it is packed full of authoritative facts. Illustrated with photographs, maps and diagrams. Over 400 pages; cloth bound.

We will send a copy of "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $3.50.

We will send a copy of "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," postpaid, to Christian Herald subscribers, as a reward for sending us TWO NEW yearly subscriptions at $2.50 each.

"Ambassador Morgenthau's Story," separately, $2.00 a copy, postpaid.

New Armistice Terms. The Germans having failed to observe the terms of the original armistice, the Allies in planning a renewal, on January 17, made some of the terms more strict and added others which had been found necessary from an economic standpoint. The new terms provide:

First—For the trial and punishment of Germans guilty of mistreating Allied prisoners.

Second—For the return by Germany at once of machinery and goods stolen from France and Belgium, 500,000 Frenchmen being out of work pending the return of this machinery.

Third—For the placing of £100,000,000 of German gold in a safe place where it will be protected from Bolshevism.

Fourth—For the turning over by Germany of all of her merchant shipping, approximately 4,000,000 tons, to carry supplies to countries in Europe, and, westbound, to carry Canadian and American soldiers back home. In return for this it was intimated that the Allied blockade would be somewhat relaxed.

Fifth—That all U-boats uncompleted are to be handed over to the Allies to be destroyed and no more submarines are to be built.

Poland's Problem. The Polish National Committee, of which Ignatz Paderewski is the head, faces difficulties East, West and Southwest. Its capital, Warsaw, was reported on January 10 as threatened by the Bolshevik army marching westward from Vilna, while the Ruthenians and the Ukrainians were attacking Przemsyl and Lemburg, and Germany was massing troops for the reconquest of Posen. On January 14, 2000 persons were reported killed in Przemsyl by Ukrainian bombardments. On January 15 it was reported that the rumors that American and British troops were to be sent to Poland, were untrue, but that two divisions of Polish troops, enlisted in America to fight on the French front, would be sent to Poland as soon as transportation could be arranged. It was thought that these trained soldiers would sufficiently reenforce the Polish armies to enable Poland to maintain herself. Poland was reported on January 17 to have taken over the defense of Lithuania against the Bolsheviki, who on the same day lost Dorpat and much military material to the Esthonians.

The Allied Policy Toward Russia. The problem of Russia and Bolshevism is one of the most difficult of those to be solved by the Peace Conference. The British Government early in January suggested that the Peace Conference receive delegates from all the various Russian factions, it being thought that by getting these delegates together in Paris, a solution of Russia's disorder might be worked out. The French, however, with the support of the Russian Committee in Paris, which represents the elements opposed to Bolshevism, thought that it was improper for the nation to receive representatives of a class of murderers such as the Bolshevists are held to be. American influence was said to be backing the British in their desire to give the Bolsheviki a hearing. In the meantime it was announced that no more troops would be sent to Russia, although the expedition now in being would be maintained. On January 15 Stockholm reported peasant uprisings in the interior of Russia against the taxes of the Bolsheviki.

Luxemburg Republic Short-Lived. The proclamation of the Republic of Luxemburg to which we referred last week appeared to be somewhat premature since, on the abdication of Grand Duchess Marie Adelaide, the Luxemburg Government officially notified the Powers of the succession to the throne of the Princess Charlotte Adelgonde. Princess Charlotte was born January 23, 1896.

Labor Announces Its Program. The American Federation of Labor announced, on January 15, a long list of suggestions looking toward comprehensive legislation to meet after-war economic and industrial problems. suggestions were briefly as follows:

Protection of labor in its right organize.

The abolition of child labor, and p vision for the overruling of the Supr Court either by popular vote or by reenaction by Congress of measures unconstitutional.

Government ownership or contro public utilities.

Graduated tax on usable agricultu lands above the acreage cultivated the owner, a measure to prevent ra extension of the tenant class.

Limiting of the powers and privile of corporations and federal charters corporations.

Better workmen's compensation la with liability insurance furnished the state.

Prohibition of immigration for t years after peace, and progressive ta on incomes, inheritances and unu lands.

Government supervision of educat and government subsidies where nec sary.

Prohibition of private employm agencies operated for profit.

Small standing army and volunt state militia.

Free transportation home for d charged soldiers and continuation their pay for twelve months after d charge, if unemployed.

Government control of all waterwa

Water power to be utilized and t electric power to be sold at cost.

Government ownership of all wharv and docks connected with public ha bors.

The building by the government model homes for workers, with a syste of credits by which workers might bui their own homes.

The Federation announced also th the present rates of wages must sta and in many instances should be i creased in order to make possible American standard of living.

What Greece Wants. Prem Venizelos of Greece on January 14 la before the Peace Conference a memora dum setting forth the claims of Gree for extension of territory. The territo he desires to include within the bound ries of the Kingdom comprises Norther Epirus, in which there are 120,0 Greeks, and 80,000 Albanians. He ask also for Thrace without Constantinop but suggested that the city might b assigned to Greece under an interna tional guarantee for the freedom of th Straits. He asked also for parts of th Asiatic territory of Turkey from Smyrn northward, in which the Greeks outnum bered the Mohammedans, and for a islands which were ethnographicall geographically and economically Gree Part of this territory is also claimed b Bulgaria. Venizelos recommended th the vilayets of Trebizond and Adan on the Black Sea, in which the Gree inhabitants predominate, should be at tached to the new Armenian state.

Fragments of News. Buenos Aire was declared under martial law on Janu ary 13, although the situation followin the strike was gradually approachin normal. The police were reported t have taken 2,000 prisoners, 200 of whom were revolutionary refugees from Spai and a number of whom were revolution ary fugitives from Russia. The authori ties in Uruguay were also holding th upper hand over the elements of disor der. It was reported that 800 persons were killed and 5,000 wounded during th strike disorders. . . . On January 1 a general strike was called at Lima and Callao, Peru. The strike was called in sympathy with the cotton mill workers who were asking an eight hour day and an increase in wages. On January 14 riots were reported in Lima and there were clashes between the strikers and troops. On January 15 all business had been suspended at Lima and Callao and the railway had been cut between the two cities. . . . The resignation of Ambassador Sharpe was announced on January 14 and no information was available as to who might be the new Ambassador to France.

Jethro's Counsel

International Sunday School Lesson for February 9

Ex. 18 : 1-27

ooperation in the Work of God's Kingdom

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

HERE is a vivid picture of ancient Oriental Life, the meeting of two wise old chieftains in the wilder- ss about Mount Sinai. Moses holds nference with Jethro, his father-in- w, the priest and leader of a kindred ibe. We can imagine the stately eeting, as Moses "did obeisance, and ssed him." Travelers tell us of the gnity and courtesy of Arab sheiks eeting in the desert to this day. They asked each other of their welfare d entered into the tent." Within e get a glimpse of Moses rehearsing Jethro the great story of the deliver- ce from Egypt, so frankly and simply cribing all the glory to God. How likely would Western statesmen be speak just so, even though they felt eply the guidance of the Almighty in e events of their land's history! All that the Lord had done"—and thing about what Moses had done! he greatest are the most humble.

Then we see the two priestly figures fering the sacrifices together, symbolic the communion of all sincere men ith the same Father however diverse eir creeds may be. If all the leaders the two nations had been like Jethro d Moses, Israel and Midian might ve lived at peace with one another.

Finally we see Moses sitting as judge, e benevolent Oriental ruler who ided himself on being accessible to even the least, of the people. xodus 18 gives insight into the details Moses' daily life as leader.

The Burdens of Leadership

The great Hebrew was in danger of eaking down through overwork at the me when Jethro came. What a rden he must have carried as he red for that mixed multitude on the arch! Such is the price of leadership. Uneasy lies the head that wears the own." If humble people could but alize the load borne by the great, ey would be little envious of great- ss. Think of Moses: all the bitter mplaining, the petty bickerings, the ob clamoring to turn back to Egypt, d even Aaron his brother fashioning e golden calf during his brief absence om the camp! Even his spokesman traying his ideals except he kept ceasing vigilance!

Those who are thoughtlessly am- tious should understand what the aster said to James and John when ey asked for high places in his ngdom: "Are ye able to drink the p that I am about to drink?" These sciples became great after all, but ey paid the penalty of greatness too. one of our evening papers there as a series of cartoons showing a lgrim traveling the way of life with s burden of cares. Each day he was own exchanging burdens gladly with me one else, whose position in life coveted. At the close of each day's lventure he was glad and thankful take up his own load again instead.

Hospitality to New Ideas

"You can' learn something from erybody." Moses was big enough d teachable enough to see the point Jethro's counsel and to adopt his ggestions. It is not every man who willing to accept good advice from s father-in-law! Yet how much tter Jethro's plan was—a division of risdiction, with subordinate judges er smaller groups, with only the most portant problems and appeals com- g up to Moses himself! Moses was no nger distracted with petty questions, grieved petitioners no longer stood day in line, the lesser chieftains ere honored and recognized.

We ought to be equally hospitable new ideas in our religious work. ach evangelical denomination has ready learned much from every other. Our new Testament gives no hard and fast rules for the practical work of the Church, just because we are to be alert to the needs of each generation. Sunday school people should be especially careful to avoid falling into ruts, keeping open minds for good methods, learning from other schools and from students of religious education. One reason why we lose so many scholars is because of a certain inflexibility in too many schools. There are so many good books and good periodicals where the conscientious Moses may find Jethro's counsel set forth. Teacher, how long since you consulted with Jethro?

The teachers' conference in the local school is invaluable. Some schools get along with none! How then do they cooperate, get new ideas? Others talk "business" only, instead of talking teaching, talking methods. Why not have one of your best teachers take a half hour at next teachers' meeting on "How I will teach next Sunday's lesson"?

The Division of Christian Work

In today's lesson we are pointed to a potent cause of ineffectiveness in Christian work—too few are carrying all the burdens. Though they be veritable Moseses, the work suffers. Often a wonderful minister does everything for his church, then dies or leaves, and all goes to pieces. A wiser though perhaps less brilliant man gives every one a task; the work endures. So it is in business. The captain of industry is noted for finding able helpers. Let us deliberately plan to ask new helpers to do Sunday school work, and to spread church offices as far as possible. It is remarkable how many good men and women can be found. Moses soon developed leaders by giving responsibility. Perhaps he had not before believed that there were any able men in his following. Some Christian leaders seem to think just that.

Cooperation the Master Word

On its practical side the Kingdom of God is cooperation. It is cooperation in twofold form, each form of which we are all too prone to forget. First of all we are workers together with God. Moses never failed to remember that, but we are apt to act as though we had no Senior Partner, wiser and greater than we. We start out so often without taking him into consultation on the business of the day. How many Sunday school teachers, think you, have ever begun lesson preparation by praying, "Now, Lord, just what is it that you want these boys and girls to learn from today's portion of thy Word?" Would not such cooperation with the Spirit result in more definite, real ministry to God's children?

And in the second place the Kingdom of God means team-work among his helpers, men and women who have come into a relationship to one another by coming into relationship with Christ. So many seem to act as though their faith was purely individualistic. But Jesus taught us to pray in the plural: Our Father, our daily bread, our debts. He sent out his disciples in teams of two, in groups of twelve and seventy. The Holy Spirit inspired men to form and organize the Church as the instrument for the promotion of the Kingdom by cooperative effort. The wonderful Paul always had his helpers and his young followers in training for common effort. We might almost say that Christianity has a two-fold watchword: "Faith in God through Jesus Christ, and Fellowship in Service in His Name." Fellowship that is merely sentimental is not going to stand in the day of testing. But practical cooperation in well-doing forms a tie that obstacles and troubles will not break.

How wonderful an improvement the war has made in our cooperation for a great common purpose in national life! Now we want to labor and to pray for a closer coordination of spiritual effort in the building of the Kingdom of Christ. Each of us can be ready to speak out for Christian Unity, not in word only but in deed, and our best preparation is to cooperate more loyally with the Christians nearest at hand.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN

Joint General Secretary, World's Sunday School Association

Tokyo, 1920

THE next largest happening in the Sunday school world following peace will be the World's Sunday School Convention in 1920 at Tokyo, Japan.

What time in 1920 has not yet been decided. At a recent meeting of officers and committee members of the World's Association Mr. Wanamaker suggested that a cable be sent to the Japanese leaders asking their preference as to date. In reply has come their suggestion, "May 20, 1920," in a cable message.

Before definitely fixing the date the preferences of the British section of the World's Committee must be taken into account. Within a month or two a decision will be arrived at as between May and October of 1920.

It is difficult to decide whether the enthusiasm for this convention is greatest in Japan or America. Quite recently a Japanese paper announced that 10,000 delegates were expected, 3,000 from America and the balance from the Orient and other parts of the world. Certain it is that this convention, following a year after the peace terms are declared, is looked forward to by the world as the greatest Christian event outside of America, and as an opportunity to bring together the Christian representatives of all countries and all churches upon a common platform and united for a forward movement to transform the world by winning and training a generation.

In Japan the Convention Promotion Committee includes a number of Japan's greatest leaders.

Various committees have already been formed by this Japan Promotion Committee to assure the success of all local arrangements, and already plans are being shaped looking toward convention buildings, entertainment of delegates, transportation, functions, etc. Baron Shibusawa has already raised 15,000 yen toward these local expenses.

A few days ago Mr. Mr. Uchida, recently Secretary of the Department of Communications of the Japanese Government, called upon Mr. H. J. Heinz at Pittsburg and at the World's Sunday School offices in the Metropolitan Tower, New York, with a letter from Baron Shibusawa to confer concerning convention plans. In February Mr. Horace Coleman, the World's Sunday School representative at Tokyo, will be in America for special conferences.

It is too early to announce definite plans as to steamers, but ample provision will be made in connection with the convention, for around-the-world trips, for circular tours of the Orient covering Japan, Philippines, China and Korea, and for observation parties who may wish to study missions at close range.

The tremendous interest in foreign missions, occasioned by the Methodist Centenary Movement and the United Missions Forward Movement covering all of the Mission Boards, will give special importance to this convention.

The World's Committee is not planning for the ordinary sight-seer. They desire only those to register who are interested in the Sunday school and in missions. The committee is more anxious for quality than for quantity, for it is recognized as of first importance that those participating should rightly represent the Christian sentiment and character of America before the alert, sharp-eyed Oriental.

Already registrations are being made for the convention in the office of the World's Sunday School Association, 216 Metropolitan Tower. Thousands of inquiries from those interested are on file. It is desired that those applying should state their relation to the Sunday school or church and their line of interest or general activities.

160 Hens 1500 Eggs

Mrs. H. M. Patton, of Waverly, Mo., writes "I have fed 2 boxes of 'More Eggs' to my hens and I think they have broken the egg record. I have 160 White Leghorns and in exactly 21 days I got 125 dozen eggs." You can do as well. In fact, any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called 'More Eggs.' Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs," and you will be amazed and delighted with results. "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 8151 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., for a $1 package of "More Eggs" Tonic. Or send $2.25 today and get three regular $1 packages on special discount for a season's supply. A million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied, your money will be returned on request and the "More Eggs" costs you nothing. Send $2.25 today or ask Mr. Reefer to send you free his poultry book that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry

Poultry Raisers Write from All Parts of the U. S. Wonderful Results of "More Eggs"

1200 Eggs from 29 Hens

The "More Eggs" Tonic did wonders for me. I had 29 hens when I got the tonic and was getting five or six eggs a day. April 1st I had over 1200 eggs. I never saw the equal.

EDW. MEKKER, Pontiac, Mich.

8988 Eggs from 125 Hens

Since using "More Eggs" I have got more eggs than any time I have been in the poultry business, about thirty years. Since the 15th of March to November 16th I have marketed 749 dozen and only have one hundred and twenty-five hens. I highly recommend "More Eggs" Tonic to all poultry raisers.

MRS. W. S. DEAHL, Exline, Iowa.

$200 Worth of Eggs from 44 Hens

I never used "More Eggs" Tonic until last December; then just used one $1.00 package and have sold over $200.00 worth of eggs from forty-four hens. "More Eggs" Tonic did it.

A. G. THODE, Sterling, Kans., R. No. 2, Box 47.

1368 Eggs After 1 Package

Last fall I bought a box of your "More Eggs" Tonic and would like to have you know the result. From January 1st to July 1st my hens laid 1368 eggs.

A. E. WHITE, Scranton, Pa.

Five Times as Many Eggs Since Using "More Eggs" Tonic

Since using "More Eggs" do not think there is one chicken that is not laying. We get from forty to fifty eggs per day. Before using "More Eggs" we were getting eight and nine eggs per day.

A. P. WOODARD, St. Cloud, Fla.

"More Eggs" Paid the Pastor

I can't express in words how much I have been benefited by "More Eggs." I've paid my debts clothed the children in new dresses, and that is not all—I paid my pastor his dues. I sold 42½ dozen eggs last week, set 4 dozen, and ate some, had 1½ dozen left.

MRS. LENA McBROON,
Woodbury, Tenn.

Increase from 2 to 45 Eggs a Day

Reefer's Hatchery:

Since I began the use of your "More Eggs" Tonic, 2 weeks ago, I am getting 45 eggs a day, and before I was only getting 2 or 3 a day.

Yours truly,
DORA PHILLIPS, Derby, Iowa.

Hens Were Transformed

I never saw such a transformation as in my hens since giving them "More Eggs."

Christmas Chest and Palestine Orphanag

AN IDEA and a $25 check that came from a Pennsylvania friend early last November started our "Christmas Chest" for little sufferers in the Holy Land.

The idea appealed magically to the whole Christian Herald Family, and THAT $25 CONTRIBUTION HAS BEEN MULTIPLIED JUST 100 TIMES.

Through the "Christmas Chest" a total of $2,500 has been cabled to the American Colony in Jerusalem for Christmas season benefactions.

While the money has multiplied an hundredfold, the idea has developed to equal bigness. The inspiration has come and the foundation is securely laid for a continuous fund for a Christian Herald Orphanage in Palestine.

The crying need of the land made sacred by the footsteps of Christ opens up to us this providential opportur for consecrated service in His name truly in His spirit. Our friends would like to participate in this manent charity are invited to to us their contributions for " Christian Herald Orphanage in P tine."

The War and the Non-Christian World

WHEN the great European War began there came the question, "What will be its effect on the non-Christian world?"

In India, Mohammedans said, "Look at these Christians killing each other by thousands and all for nothing; they are a great deal worse than we Mohammedans." But what of the advance made? A vast campaign of evangelism, so far-reaching in its extent that in the city of Lahore alone non-Christians were heard to exclaim again and again, "What has happened to the Christians? One cannot go anywhere without meeting some one talking about Christ."

The war offered the chance to train some splendid Indian Christian leadership, and scores of choice young Indian Christians were sent into the Y. M. C. A. huts, where their influence on the Indian soldiers returning from the front was such that they have been spoken of in glowing terms. Thousands of homes, especially in the Punjab, where the bulk of the army was recruited, are open to the Christian message as never before.

In China, the fact that "Christian nations possess national unity in a marked degree and their people willingly make the greatest sacrifice, excited the admiration of the Chinese more than the spectacle of unbrotherly warfare has excited disgust. On the whole there has been a greater receptivity to the Christian message than ever before.

In Africa, with the confusion of the approaching armies and the retreating enemy, the missionary beheld the calm of those threatened with instant death if they would not consent to violate the law of God, dying in some instances for their faith, and then, after the restoration of order, beheld the tribes fairly yelling for the Gospel.

In Syria and Persia, the ministrations of the missionary, based on his ideal of what Christianity means, has had its influence on all these peoples of the Near East, and opened wide the doors for future progress. Native peoples the world over have been led to recognize as never before the true character of the work and the real worth of the missionary and his message.

In Japan the war has not hurt missions; rather the contrary, as the people have learned the great principles for which the Allies are fighting, and if there are no hitches at the close of the war we may look forward to a new era of opportunity and realization in Japan as the nations are drawn closer together in the interests of peaceful progress.

THE government launched its new $2,000,000,000 War Stamp Campaign Friday, January 17, the 213th birthday of Benjamin Franklin, whose portrait is printed on the stamps.

The new stamp is blue in color and bears on its face the varying costs of the stamp per month during each of the twelve months of the year. The January cost is $4.12, and this increases up to the December cost of $4.23. The government promises to pay $5 for each stamp on January 1, 1924. This return for five years' investment represents four per cent. interest on the cost, compounded quarterly.

For this new Franklin issue of W Savings Stamps, new cards have bee provided. Cards used for 1918 will n be available for 1919. The limit of pu chase has been set at $1,000 per indivi ual, and this limit is not affected b amount of 1918 stamps that may hav been purchased.

The War Loan Organization is mak ing a strong appeal for patriotic pu chase with its slogan: "Build for Ame ican Prosperity and Your Own Success.

The Bubbling Spring

By
E. RYERSON YOUNG

A STALWART man, gray of hair and well bronzed, stepped into the minister's vestry and was rtily greeted by his old friend, the tor of that church. The minister l been busy trying to encourage a ouraged young Christian. From Master's words, "The water I shall e him shall be in him a well of water inging up into everlasting life," he l drawn a picture of a bubbling, over-ving, everlasting spring, laughing in sunshine. There is nothing more ractive to the eye, soothing to tired ure or refreshing to thirsty man. at is the experience, joy and manner service Christ would have his dis-es enjoy and render.

'he discouraged one said that the ure of the bubbling spring with everlasting flow and rainbow spray pretty enough, but such was only nd on the mountainside, away from busy ways and cares and sins of 1.

You cannot be a bubbling spring of lness and spiritual blessing in the st of corrupt humanity today," l the young man. "Away in the ds, away on the mountainside, y alone with God, it may be a dif-nt thing."

A spring anywhere," said the visi-who was a surveyor by profession had seen a great deal of natural nomena, "has always seemed to me onderful thing. As a boy, nothing acted me more than to watch a spring bubbling right up out of the earth, sending up its clear, sparkling, healthful water to bless man and beast, and to gladden and fertilize nature. Then, as a man, when out surveying I have never gotten over my wonder at seeing a rugged, rocky old mountain yielding to God's kindly power and through its stony heart having the sweet, refreshing water of life come and then spring out into the sunshine with its gladness and blessing."

"That shows how God can break up the stony ground of man's hard and stubborn nature," said the minister, "and make the waste places glad with his presence and blessing. The sinner need not despair, but may know that God has power to forgive sin, to break up the stony soul and through it cause to flow streams of sweetness that shall not only sparkle in the light of the Sun of Righteousness but will also be of comfort to those mortals who come in contact with him."

"That is all right," said the young man, "but these things have a chance to be alone with God. Today we young people are so crowded together we get no chance to be alone with God. They are pushing us and jostling us on every side and their influence is always evil. There seems to be no chance to be a decent Christian in a crowd."

"I am not fond of crowds myself," said the surveyor. "That was one reason why I chose my way of life. I like the out-of-doors. It is good for the health of body and soul. But let me tell you of an experience that I once had. It is one that I shall not forget in a hurry. I was surveying new land in a northern section for the government. We got into what seemed for a time to be an interminable marsh. Brackish, bitter, slimy water abounded. It was a refuge of frogs and watersnakes, mosquitoes and all manner of horrid flies. The country seemed to be a sunken, sodden, forsaken land. All manner of corruption was in evidence. What trees there had been had fallen and were rotting in the sun. The day was cruelly hot. The flies were making life almost unbearable. Water was all around but none fit to drink.

"On and on we paddled, guided by our compasses, but the dreary marsh seemed to have no end. No solid land was to be found where we might go and make tea. We were tired, thirsty and almost exhausted. We rested on our paddles and discussed the matter. My helpers were for going back to the camp we had left in the morning. But I said that would be but to go over the whole journey again. While we were resting I looked carefully around to examine our position. To the right I noticed that the water was somewhat clearer and we paddled over there. Still farther to the right we noticed that the water was clearer still. Then we came to a spot where the water was bubbling up with strength, breaking in the sunshine and by its strong flow forcing back the brackish waters all around it. I put out my hand, dipped some up and tasted it carefully. It was fresh, sweet and cool! How we drank with gladness and were revived! I had never seen such a thing before. We examined it carefully and marked it on our maps, so that any poor voyageur or prospector caught in that awful marsh might find it to his salvation. There is that wonderful spring, in the midst of that wide, stagnant, infested marsh, making its sweetness and power felt and bringing refreshment, if not life itself, to the weary traveler."

"There is your answer, my boy," said the minister enthusiastically, patting the young man on the shoulder. "Thanks, Henderson, thanks. You have helped more than this young man today. You have not only shown us that God has power to break up the stony heart and plant within it his springs that will flow through the mountain, away from the busy haunts of men, but that in the midst of busy surroundings, where evil is rife, he can place a spring of grace and gladness, so sweet and peaceful that it can force its way through all corruption and come right up and shine in God's sunshine; yea, and by its very goodness beat back the evil all around it, bringing refreshment and new life to those who come near it."

The minister offered prayer and then the young man left, helped and inspired to continue in Christian service as he had not been for many a day.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

L Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in y prayer at the noon hour. Also any is at liberty to send a request for yer or an acknowledgment of answered yer, thereby becoming enrolled as a iber of the Prayer League.

3E STILL and know that I am God." Thus God speaks to us through the words of the Psalm-(Psa. 46.) Christ warned us against importunate who thought they ıld be heard for their much speak- True prayer is communion and munion implies a listening ear as as an answering tongue. "God is refuge and strength."

'e can afford to be still. Why should become importunate? Does he not w our needs before we ask him? haps our greatest need is to hear his e. Knowing that the Lord is God, he is with you, that he cares for , wait silently before him for the sing he is ready to pour out.

he real needs of the members of the yer League are many and diverse. e are unselfish, others distinctly onal; but God knows, and if we d the whole of our prayer hour ing out our petitions, how shall we ive that blessing which he holds ready for us? We are always in such a rush. The cumbering cares of the day crowd hard upon each other, and the noon hour finds us hurried, nervous, perplexed. We drop our work and carry our hurry to the place of prayer. Even thus we find a blessing. But how much greater the blessing if we divest ourselves of the pressure of things and, opening our windows toward our Jerusalem, wait patiently, devoutly, worshipping, until his peace steals over our spirits and his Spirit witnesses that we are his, consecrated and charged with a message and a duty to mankind.

It may be hard to achieve quietness of spirit in the midst of a nervous day; it may take an exercise of will to halt the tempest in our souls; but God's peace waits on our quietness. If we will turn to him and drop our burden of care at his feet, we shall find peace and bear a song away.

It is easy to be still in spirit in the midst of some great solitude; it is not so easy among the whirling currents of every day. Yet the Friends achieve this waiting upon God, and in their quiet hours they apprehend God's power and loving-kindness. Seated on a spur of the Rockies, with a river tumbling over its bed so far below that its rushing torrent only sparkles in the sun and no sound rises, with the whisper of the wind in the waving pines inaudible, with even the drifting clouds beneath your vision, you are overborne with the wonder of nature and fall silent instinctively before the majesty of nature's God. In such a situation the spirit reaches outward and upward, silently, prayerfully, until the sense of His presence wraps us round.

"Be still and know." Let your worship create a silence in the midst of today and you shall know not only that Jehovah is God, but that you are his and that he has blessed you.

Requests and Reports

One hundred and forty-one ask prayer for healing of themselves or others; forty-five ask prayer for various blessings for themselves or others; fourteen for the conversion of sons, and thirty-one for the conversion of other friends and relatives; and eight request prayer for revivals and reforms.

Fourteen acknowledge answers to prayer—four for recovery from sickness; two for recovery from operations; one for cure of the liquor habit; one for restoration of the mind, and one each for a revival at Ooltewah, Tenn., and a temperance victory in Texas.

The School Garden Army's Peace Campaign

SOME time ago the editor of the Christian Herald wrote to Secretary of the Interior Franklin K. Lane a suggestion for a Peace Garden Campaign to be undertaken under that name by what is now known as the School Garden Army. The matter was considered by the School Garden directors, and the editor received a copy of their 1919 program in which they say, "The United States School Garden Army, which was organized by the Bureau of Education primarily as a war measure, and which is launching a great campaign for 1919 at the request of the Food Administration, has decided, at a national conference of garden directors just held in Washington, to retain its name, though it is now to engage in a Peace Garden Campaign. Such publicity has been obtained through the use of the name already that it has assumed the value of a trade mark. As an army, however, it makes war only on weeds and garden pests, and does constructive work both for food and conservation."

Young People's Topics for February

"I Will"—"What Will I?"

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Heb. 10 : 5-9, 19-25. (Consecration Meeting, Decision Day)

THE supreme work of the Christian Endeavor and of every Young People's Society is the bringing of young people into that conscious relationship with Christ which comes through faith in Him as Lord and Saviour. The social hour, the various avenues of ministry, the devotional meeting, the committee assignments, all of these must bear toward the one end of individual decision to follow Christ and to serve Him.

Jesus Christ was offered for our sins. Calvary ended the need for the sacrifice of bulls and goats. By His blood we enter into the holy place and we become, through Him, children of God. He is our sacrifice to wipe away our guilt and our High Priest to lead us to God and to the fullness of the knowledge of God which only He can impart. But we must follow.

God does not force us to choose the right. We may refuse His salvation. Salvation in Christ is a free gift, but we must accept it, definitely, concretely, completely, with all our powers of heart and mind. We cannot become Christians by merely feeling interested in the work of the church. We cannot be His merely by attending, ever so zealously, the services held in His name. We can only become Christians by giving ourselves wholly to Him and saying with our whole hearts: "Lord Jesus, I will accept thy sacrifice; I will follow thee, I will serve thee." We must accept Him unreservedly, put Him first, give Him our all of love and life, and stick to His cause through thick and thin.

Being a real Christian isn't always easy. Upright, uncompromising, earnest, achieving Christian living is always bumping into the world's love of ease and pleasure and gain; but the right kind of Christian living bumps the world toward better things, and Christ has promised His spirit to those who will to follow Him.

The Leaven of Freedom at Work in India

Epworth League Topic. Matt. 11 : 28-30; 9 : 35-38

CHRIST has often entered a mission field on the vans of commerce. In 1600 India was a seething mass of tribal conflict. The British East India Company, organized to trade, had first to conquer. From 1774, when Warren Hastings became Governor-General, the history of India is a succession of wars, rebellions and pacifyings which constantly extended British rule and which eventuated in orderly government about the middle of the last century. England fought mutiny and famine with equal determination and gradually India came to recognize the benevolence of Britain's rule and to accept the measures of self-government permitted by the Empire, as promises of the day of greater freedom. But the India of 1600 and he India of 1856 were alike unfit to rule themselves. Across the face of freedom India wrote the one word "caste," and caste means slavery of the worst sort, the iron-bound slavery of denied opportunity, of class membership which cannot be changed, and to caste was added ignorance.

With William Carey and Adoniram Judson there entered India the spirit of Christ, which makes all men free, which banishes caste and wipes out class distinctions. Upper-caste India has been slow to yield to the faith of Chri while lower-caste India has flocked the Saviour. Christian services a schools are crowded. The mass mo ment has brought thousands wh tens came formerly. And now the up classes are beginning to see that ca must go, and to recognize that Chr must come into the life of India bef India can be free. Thus Christiani through faith and education, is bringi a unity of feeling among the 675 nati states of India, and when India takes h place under the Cross, we may exp to see her an independent natio Whether she will be independent Australia is, or as the American Uni is, is a detail to be worked out.

The need of India today is me Christian men, big men, who lo Christ more than all else and who c transplant His spirit and His life in that age-old civilization of the Ea which needs the touch of the divine order that it may achieve the indepe dence of which it dreams.

Presbyterians and the Ne Era Movement

THE New Era Movement is maki rapid progress in Northern Ne York. Large delegations from sev presbyteries, Rochester, Niagara, Bu falo, Genesee, Geneva, Lyons ar Steuben, participated in a gatheri which represented the whole Presby terian denomination, on Monda December 30. Conferences were held i Central Presbyterian Church, Roc ester, and a mass meeting in the evenin in the Brick Presbyterian Church i that city, at which Rev. Dr. J. Lyo Caughey presided.

Rev. Dr. William Hiram Foulke general secretary of the New Er Movement, made the principal a dresses at the conference. He said i substance: "We see now humanity i groups, separated by the accident birth into nations, and we know no that we must meet these groups b group response. We are to help giv these peoples life, liberty and happ ness. Every denomination is afire t lend a hand. The war has opene the gates of closed countries. Th dawn of hope of universal Christianit approaches. We know what this ne era represents. Now how shall we solv it? How was the war won? In tw ways: First, by individual sacrifice, an second, by allied strategy. We, t have battles to win. If we study how t war was won and do not underestimat the enemy, or the subtle foes tha menace us, we shall surely win. W must socialize our churches. We mus get after the forces that influence ou youth. We have been blind too long We shall work at this problem till w solve it. We have the support of th country. Besides, there is a magnificen body of men in the Laymen's Council men who have distinguished themselve in every walk of life. With such a ban of generals and with the church for ou army, we cannot meet defeat."

MAKING OF THE PEACE PLANS

A PROPHET - NOT WITHOUT HONOR

A SHORT STORY

By GEORGE GILBERT

AUTHOR OF "KING OF THE SHILLIBERS"

GOOD FRIENDS

COPYRIGHT 1919 BY THE PROCTER & GAMBLE CO., CINCINNATI

THE woman who uses Ivory Soap applies her personal standards of cleanliness to everything about her home. Nothing less than this mild, pure, white soap which she prefers for her own radiant skin is good enough for her fine linens, flawless silver, fragile china and sparkling glass.

Ivory Soap is unusual in that it cleans all these things perfectly and safely. It does this because it is the highest grade soap that can be made—as harmless as soft, clear rain water.

Ivory Soap makes such thick, lasting, non-alkaline suds that it washes linens without harmful rubbing and without injury of any kind, while its whiteness leaves no discoloration on the snowiest damask.

The purity and quality of Ivory Soap make it ideal for washing silver, china and glass. It is as clean as the food from your own kitchen. It contains no unsaponified oil to cloud the shining surfaces. It is made of such carefully selected materials that it leaves no suggestion of a soapy odor.

Let us send you the free booklet "Unusual Uses of Ivory Soap." It will tell you how to care for your choicest possessions. Address Dept. 2-B, The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

The Troubles of the Peacemaker

A Comprehensive Outline of the Now Existing National and Racial Divisions and Fragments in Europe and Their Various Aspirations and Conflicting Claims. The Actual Situation in All Its Complexities With Which the Peace Conference Has to Deal

By RAE D. HENKLE

THE passing of the old order in Germany and the Austro-Hungarian Empire loosed on the diplomatic world questions which are even more pregnant with meaning to Europe and its future peace than those which engaged the Congresses of Vienna and Berlin following the Napoleonic wars and the convulsions in the Balkans and the Near East in the early seventies. With the first signs of the collapse of the Central Powers these questions began to intrude themselves. And they are questions which have been responsible for virtually all the European wars in the last two hundred years

IT IS an optimist indeed who will predict that the diplomatists who have assembled about the peace table at Paris can put Europe in that equi- um for which the brains of the con- t for so long a time have been seeking ain. The adjustments which are sary are the subject of the most hing inquiry, with perhaps less con- ation than ever before to purely po- l arguments; but it must be recog- l that some of them will grind against nal ambitions and ethnological claims ore than one of the powers which sed the Teutonic allies.

ere is a spirit of conciliation in the e congress, a desire to gratify all ful nationalistic pleas. But in grant- nany of these pleas it is not merely conciliation the uncertain virtues of compromise which must alled upon.

ch people has its traditions, customs, common itions. It feels that these can be retained or fied only by common effort, untrammeled by out- l authority. Each is jealous of its rights and us for the cause of all its brothers who are sepa- l from it by arbitrarily drawn boundaries. It is feeling that kept France vivified and Italy r.

e continental ambitions of France we may con- satisfied in the assurance of the return of Alsace- aine. With Italy the situation is less simple. She the assurance of the "Irredenta" regions, but she that additional safeguards in the Adriatic should iven to her. And here she comes into conflict ambitions that move against her.

hink for a minute of this list of claimants in the ain redrawing of European boundaries: Italy, ece, Jugo-Slavia, Roumania, Denmark, France, the nan states, Hungary, Poland, Albania, Bulgaria. land at the present time is vitally interested in the opean adjustment solely as a spectator because claims are outside the continent.

THE satisfaction of almost any one of these de- nands some state will be asked to agree to a sacri- In the warmth of feeling among the Allies has followed victory such a sacrifice may seem a e thing, to be compensated for in more altruistic s.

ut the sense of closeness, of kinship, on the field of tle, passes all too quickly under the stress of the tical days of peace and the spirit that was behind sacrifice slowly undergoes a change. National am- ons and racial desires reassert themselves. Intrigue ins, to be followed by plot. And that is the be- ing of war. We have only to recall that in other s, England and Austria, France and Germany, nce and Austria, England and Germany, Italy and many and Austria, Turkey and England and nce, were allies, and poured out their blood to- her on the battlefield, to realize that international ndships, unless grounded in something more solid n self-interest, are ephemeral things, ready to be ken at the least sign of trouble.

laims and counter-claims before the Peace Con- nce will consume day after day of discussion for nths. The questions which will arise cannot be tled out of hand. They will require the deepest ught, the most searching investigation. The conference will be prolonged because so much depends on every decision. No man can hazard a guess as to how long it will continue in session. It seems worth our while, then, to consider briefly some of the problems which in themselves hold ominous possibilities.

THE keenest interest in territorial adjustment has centered in Alsace-Lorraine. That question was settled and removed from discussion by the acceptance by Germany of the armistice terms. France recovers her lost provinces, but in addition she wants certain defense against a future strong Germany, and now asks for the left bank of the Rhine in Lorraine. Many diplomatists believe she is inviting a new Alsace-Lorraine problem with Germany as the sufferer and are loath to agree to such a settlement, for it is admitted this middle Rhine country is just as Teutonic as Alsace is French.

Next in interest is "Italia Irredenta." "Unredeemed Italy" comprises the Trentino and Istria south to include the port of Trieste. Thus far there is no dispute, but the statesmen of Italy feel that her position on the Adriatic demands more than that and they are obligated to ask the Peace Conference for an extension of her hegemony on the eastern shores of the sea. That the Italian people themselves see danger in this policy has been indicated, however, by the recent cabinet crisis and subsequent reorganization of the government which was due almost entirely to the objection on the part of a conservative group of ministers to such a pronounced imperialistic program. The imperialists won under the leadership of Baron Sidney Sonnino, the foreign minister who is an ardent champion of the Adriatic cause.

Here is the first important conflict of ambitions, for Italy is laying claim to a portion of the Adriatic littoral which is definitely claimed by the new state of Jugo-Slavia.

A second conflict appears still further south where Italy desires a form of protectorate over Albania, and an influence at the very least over the affairs of Epirus.

Jugo-Slavia is, roughly, compounded of Serbia, Montenegro, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Dalmatia and Croatia under the present regency of Prince Alexander, crown prince of Serbia. Reference to a Balkan map will show it presses about Trieste, leaving a shallow neck of land about the sea, and that it reaches down to take in the shoreland a slight distance beyond the port. Fiume, the old Austrian naval base at Pola, and Cattaro, are within the bounds named by its proponents.

THE clash of nationalities here came early. Immediately after the grant of an armistice to Austria, Italian detachments occupied Trieste, Pola and Fiume, and military governorships were established over the adjoining districts. The Jugo-Slavs, organizing a provisional government at Agram, took alarm and sent an armed force to Fiume. There seems to have been no fighting, but after some developments which are not clear the Jugo-Slav flag was hoisted over the town. This alarmed the Entente powers, and an international force was sent to occupy the city. An Ohio regiment is the American representation in this force, which, however, is under Italian command.

Italy's desire means, in a broad sense, a control of some character over the ports on the eastern side of the sea and absolute control over the strait of Otranto, which is the entrance to the Adriatic. The latter would involve not only control over Avlona, the Albanian port, which was seized by Italy in 1914, and was the base for the Italian operations in the Balkans, and still is held under Italian administration, but the whole of the Albanian coast. To this proposal the Albanians seriously object. They are conducting a wide agitation in favor of their independence either as a limited monarchy or as a republic.

Greece is making bitter charges against Italy, based on what she declares is Italian colonization of Northern Epirus, with the intent of laying claim to the region on the basis of racial majority. There are certain islands in the Ægean sea, too, which both countries want, and which at this time they seem determined to have.

BUT while these disputes with Greece complicate the situation, they may be regarded as of slight importance when compared with the conflict with Jugo-Slavia. Disregarding ethnological arguments, the Paris conference must find some way of satisfying the legitimate demands of the Jugo-Slav peoples for a free outlet to the sea and the understandable demands for safeguards against aggressive action on the part of any states which may be set up opposite the peninsula. It is certain that a salt water exit must be granted to the new nation which is growing up about Serbia. It is and probably will continue to be cut off from the Mediterranean, and the Adriatic will be its only outlet to the world. And on the possession of such an outlet most assuredly depends its development into an economically secure state. A very ambitious program of internal improvement already has been mapped out by the Jugo-Slavs, including a series of railroads to open up the hinterland and connect the Adriatic with the Black Sea and the Danube, but all these improvements depend entirely on the ownership of a tide-water terminal. Italy, in compromise, has offered to make Fiume a free port if it is given to her, but in the circumstances this fails to satisfy the Slavs, who would have to depend on the good will of an alien nation—and certainly not a friendly one—for the safety of its communications with the world at large.

The tenseness of this situation is illustrated by the fact that the following sentiment, voted at Belgrade by the National Council of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, formerly under Austro-Hungarian domination, has been transmitted officially to the State Department at Washington:

"We are profoundly grieved to be obliged to place on record that a great part of our national soil is occupied by the troops of the Kingdom of Italy which is allied with the powers of the Entente and with which we desire to live in friendly relations. But we cannot recognize the opportunity of any treaty, not even that of London, in virtue of which it is in violation of the principles of nationality.

"We desire to draw the attention of your Royal Highness (Crown Prince Alexander) to the fact that the extent of the Italian occupation greatly exceeds the limits and regions foreseen in the clauses of the armistice concluded with the commander-in-chief of the Austro-Hungarian army after the proclamation of these territories as independent and an integral part of the Serb, Croat and Slovene State, and we will furnish the government of Your Royal Highness with proof of this, in the full conviction that Your Royal Highness will make it his task, together with our entire nation, to see to it that the definite frontiers of our State are drawn in such a way that they accord with the ethnographical frontiers and are in conformity with the principles laid down by President Wilson of the United States and the other powers of the Entente."

The Treaty of London, referred to in the memorandum, is the agreement signed secretly by England, France and Russia with Italy, on April 26, 1915, which brought from Italy her renunciation of the Triple Alliance, of which she was a member, and her entry into the war on the side of the Allies. This treaty, whose existence was suspected, but which did not come to light until after the close of the war, guaranteed to Italy those territories which she is demanding today. The agreement is under severe criticism as being contrary in letter and spirit to the principles of "open diplomacy" to which all the nations theoretically are committed, and at the same time in violation of that principle enunciated by President Wilson by which each people has a voice in the disposition of its future. Both these points were understood to be foundation stones of a permanent peace.

IT IS no simple diplomatic task to winnow the great mass of claims which are only suggested here, and separate the grain from the chaff. It is not an exaggeration to say that each one of them contains the germs of a war. Whether the threshing be done by the delegates to the Peace Conference or by the representatives elected to a League of Nations, it will be the latter who will have to conciliate the contestants and, it may be, authorize the police powers which will be assumed by the League, to keep a watchful eye and a strong hand on the territories certain to remain in dispute, no matter what decisions may have been rendered regarding them

STILL another Balkan question which must be solved is that of Macedonia. In the more or less indefinite territory which bears this name there are three claimants—Serbia, Greece and Bulgaria. The latter, we may say, must accept whatever decision is rendered by the Conference and be glad it is no worse. We must remember, however, that Macedonia is a prolific breeder of trouble, and unless unrest is to continue—an unrest that no League of Nations could prevent—some consideration must be given here to legitimate national interests. The world must decide whether it is wiser to punish, with the possibility of recurring Balkan squabbles, or draw as strict and equitable a national line as the involved ethnographic conditions permit. On this decision most assuredly rests the possible recrudescence of the "Balkan question" which has been the cause of more than the last European war. The Allies, in 1915, recognized the injustices which followed the ending of the First and Second Balkan wars and sought then equitably to distribute the territory in dispute. Their diplomacy failed. The great Greek statesman, Venizelos, was willing at that time to make concessions in behalf of his country, and undoubtedly still is willing, provided Greece receives compensation in the form of distinctly Greek districts in the Ægean and in Asia Minor.

RUMANIA, badly buffeted in the last two years, deserted and betrayed by Russia and crushed by Germany and Austria, finds inspiration in the victory of her friends in the west, and hopes to come out of the Peace Conference with Wallachia and Moldavia restored to her, and her "lost children" in Transylvania and Bessarabia once more under the protection of Bucharest. This ambition probably will be realized to a large extent. Certainly she will have those parts of the kingdom wrested from her by von Mackensen, and she will receive some territory from what is now Transylvania. This region, a part of Hungary, admittedly is Rumanian in spirit and in nationality. The Magyars have bitterly resented at other times any suggestion that it be turned over to Rumania, but there is reason to believe that recent events have made them not only acquiescent but quite willing that a region of discontent be eliminated from the Magyar republic. Little future dissension need be anticipated here. In fact, Rumania stands in excellent position because the remainder of her "Irredenta" lies in Bessarabia, which now falls under the jurisdiction of the Ukrainians. It is foreign to the White Russians, and it may be presumed they will not put obstacles in the way of its reunion with the little mother country.

Diplomacy, however, will be severely taxed to so adjust the confines of Poland, Czecho-Slovakia and the Ukraine as to ensure any degree of composure in Central Europe in the coming years.

The ancient kingdom of Poland was divided at various times between Prussia, Russia and Austria. The latter two have virtually signed a quit-claim to any interest they may have had in the kingdom. The Poles anticipated such action by Prussia by moving in, soon after the collapse of the German armies in the west, and occupying Posen and a good part of Silesia. These provinces comprise a part of the Polish territory which millions of dollars spent by the German state in colonization failed completely to Germanize. The conservative Germans encouraged a military effort to recover them from the Poles, but the de facto Berlin government, either from inability to act or from disinclination, has taken no serious steps to dispute possession. An interview with Herr Ebert, however, indicates that Posen will not be given up without a struggle and such part of the German army as is intact is being held in position to enforce Germanic claims on this territory.

CONFLICT between the Poles, the Czecho-Slavs and the Ukrainians is continuous. The first break in the Austro-Hungarian confederation came with the revolt of the Czechs centering at Prague. The Czech state, which established its seat at Pressburg, but now has moved back to Prague, took immediate control of Bohemia, a small part of German Austria, and parts of Moravia, Ruthenia and adjacent provinces. The line of racial demarcation is quite indistinct in all the region of northern Austria and Galicia, and it seems to be the purpose of the opposing elements to take by force of arms all the territory within reach, in the hope that the Peace Conference will consider occupation and control sufficient evidence to justify an award of suzerainty.

Poland, with perfect logic, claims Cracow and western Galicia, which no one disputes. As one passes east, the Ruthenians, racially allied to the Ukrainians, assert their rights to much of the territory east of the San, including Przemsyl and Lemberg. The Poles entered both towns. Bitter fighting has been in progress ever since, especially around Lemberg, but they still are holding out. A very uncertain government exists, and since the overthrow of the Ukrainian Government at Kieff an even greater degree of unsettledness characterizes all this region.

All over the old Hungarian dominion there have occurred outbreaks, more or less local in origin, but of wide significance since they are the outgrowth of racial instincts and have for their objects the formation of autonomous states out of what may be called "speech islands." In other words, districts of debatable nationality, but having more or less distinct dialect, are expressing a demand for self-determination, backing up their demands with a show of force organized by returned or deserting soldiers, and all these will be laid in some form on the green table in the Quay d'Orsay.

GALICIA, with its wonderful oil fields and other rich natural resources, is the big prize these new states and psuedo-states are striving for. It is a prize of great price and will require the utmost care in allotment if any of the contending peoples are to be even partly satisfied.

While she is not a belligerent, Denmark is co the conference with a request for the righting wrong done to Schleswig-Holstein in 1866. I probable the conferees will return Schleswig, to Denmark, and perhaps grant to Holst plebescite which Germany has wrongfully de her for the last forty years. Such a course w move the only discernable cause for future u southern Scandinavia. The questions of Finla the Russian Baltic provinces necessarily must sidered with Russia as a whole.

The attitude of the Peace Congress toward cannot be defined at this time. While Belgi made no official claims to additional territory direction there seems to be a disposition to ext frontier east to the Rhine and to permit her t that little neck of the Netherlands running Meuse river and comprising a part of the prov Limburg. Holland is in poor position to dispu an award, but there is no indication at prese Belgium cares to assume its administration the will of its inhabitants. The question is delicacy and seems to have been suggested as a punishment for Holland than for any reason. Belgium, however, wants the littl strip lying between her present northern and the Scheldt river, so that the Schelc form her boundary and Antwerp become independent of foreign regulations. This, it probable, will be ceded to her.

OUTSIDE of Europe, th important problem, from the disposition of th man-African colonies, is t position of Kiaochao, the base established by Germa der the terms of a ninetyni lease in the Chinese provi Shantung. At the same time, Baron Kato intimated a pu to turn Kiaochao back to China when German been ejected. Tsingtau was occupied by the Jap on November 16, 1914. Early in December, Baron stood in the Diet agreeable to these interpella

"First: Whether Kiaochao [will be return China?

"Second: Whether the Imperial Government pledged to China or to any other power in the n of the final disposition of Kiaochao?

"Third: Whether the clause in the ultimatu Germany) referring to the final restitution of chao did not bind the action of Japan?"

To the interpellations Baron Kato replied:

"First: The question regarding the future of chao was at present unanswerable.

"Second: Japan had never committed herself t foreign power on this point.

"Third: The purpose of the ultimatum to Ger was to take Kiaochao from] Germany and so re peace to the Orient. Restitution after a cam was not thought of and was not referred to i ultimatum."

It is the settlement of the future of Kiaochao extended to the whole of the Shantung pro which Japan slowly but irresistibly has occ from her vantage point of the old German l hold, that will fix the relationship between United States and China for many years to c China has regarded the United States as her first almost her only friend. The road to the Chinese heart and tra open and the eyes of the whole nation will be watc the attitude we take to their claims for the restitu of Shantung to the Chinese Republic. This ques above all other territorial questions, is the on which the United States has the greatest d sentimental and economic interest.

Russia in the Days of the Czar

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

IS, the fifth article in the series of recollections by)r. Clark, Christian Endeavor's founder, marks the contrast between the Russia of eighteen years ago, akened and submissive, and the volcano of revolu- vhich is Russia today. The author, however, sees ahead for Russia after the storm.

a plain statement of experiences in Russia, when destructive forces were gathering head, may not ithout interest.

Y FIRST visit of any length to Russia was in 1900, that epoch-making year in the history of East. I had been attending many Christian eavor conventions and union meetings in Japan China, and found myself with Mrs. Clark and elve-year-old son in Peking in May of that year, w days only before the terrible Boxer rebellion e out.

ing exceedingly anxious to reach London in sea- or the great World's Christian Endeavor Conven- which was to take place in July, we debated h of the three or four routes we should take. We it sail across the Pacific to America, cross the inent and then the Atlantic in a rush, and reach convention in season; but that seemed too much going back on our tracks. We might sail around th America to Europe or to India and then through Suez Canal to England, but we had scarcely time. we might take the untried route across Siberia ly by rail and partly by river steamer. No one we w of had ever taken this trip, for in May, 1900, it not opened to travelers; but we were assured that une 1 it would be possible to go across Siberia by n. Scarcely a week before the forts of Taku were upon and the awful massacres of missionaries and nese Christians began, we sailed from Taku, port eking, coasted along the shores of Korea, and on y 30, 1900, landed in Vladivostok.

hen began the long, long journey across trackless ria. This was our route in brief outline: First, five hundred miles by rail to Khabarofsk, on the Amur; then twenty days on various river steamers, as the rivers grew shallower and the boats smaller; then another week in military cars crowded with mujiks and marked on the outside, "for twelve horses or forty-two men."

During this most uncomfortable week, traveling day and night, we negotiated only about a thousand miles. At night we wrapped ourselves in our rugs, and stretched out on plank seats only about half as long as the average human body. At last, however, Lake Baikal was reached—Siberia's "holy sea"—and the worst of our troubles were over, for a little to the west of the lake is the fine city of Irkutsk.

From Irkutsk a rather shabby so-called train de luxe took us in nine days to Petrograd (then St. Petersburg), and in two days more a real express train brought us to London, forty-two days from Vladivostok, and barely in time for the convention, to attend which we had journeyed west five-sixths of the distance around the world.

A revolutionary demonstration in Petrograd in the interval between the Czar and the Bolshevik Red Terror

IN THOSE days, what was Russia? Part of it a vast wilderness, 6,000 miles across, occupied by only 5,000,000 souls, stretching from the boundless Pacific to the Urals; then another section, less than a third as large, where 150,000,000 lived, yet with room for 150,000,000 more—such was Russia physically. Spiritually she was a vast domain of ignorance and superstition, occupied by honest-hearted, reverent peasants, with a comparatively few skeptical intellectuals near the top, and a weak, irresolute Czar at the very top, surrounded by sycophants, flatterers, cruel, selfish schemers and corrupt priests. Can any one wonder that Russia during many years was approaching her Niagara of revolution, and that at last she took the fatal plunge?

Most of the way on the Amur River and on the Shilka we towed behind us a prison barge. On the railway trains at least one prison car was as necessary as a baggage car. At the stations we frequently saw prisoners chained together, lugging water or wood, or working on the highway.

Siberia with its frozen prison camps and its nameless cruelties, was bound to spell, sooner or later, the destruction of autocratic Russia.

But there was and is another side to Siberia, and that Russia west of the Urals. Here lived and live today scores of millions of honest, kind-hearted, religious peasants—peasants who love their native land and revered their Czar because to them he typified Russia. "Great is the Czar, great is the Czar," a peasant on a steamer was heard to repeat to himself. "But God is greater," said a bystander. "Yes," responded the peasant, "but our Czar is young yet."

This story is characteristic of the unthinking reverence which is part of the mujik's character—a reverence which, now that the Czar has been hurled from his pedestal in their hearts, may, I believe, center itself on the unseen Ruler of the universe.

The kindness of the common people we often experienced on that long journey across Siberia. Even the poorest of them was always ready to share his crust of black bread or his bowl of sour whey with us. When we were able to make them a little present—like an old coat, or a loaf of white bread—their gratitude was touching. One peasant woman, to whom I had given some biscuits, quite embarrassed me by seizing my feet and kissing them, as though I had presented her with a kingdom.

The soldiers, of whom we saw many on this journey, always followed their morning ablutions by standing in their ranks for silent prayer, before they attacked their breakfast. In such an appreciative, generous, reverent and truly religious people, I believe there is the making of a great nation, when the present nightmare is no longer ridden, and the orgy of democracy run mad is succeeded by calmer days of commonsense and humanity.

ON THREE other occasions I have been within the borders of the former Czar's domains—the last time but one being in 1911, for the sake of attending a little Christian Endeavor convention in Riga, and some similar meetings in St. Petersburg. Knowing there might be difficulty in getting permission to speak after arriving in Riga, I had asked Ambassador Guild, former governor of Massachusetts and a personal friend, to obtain for me the necessary permit. He applied again and again, and for two months was put off with one excuse after another, referred first to one minister, then to another, and all to obtain permission for a humble minister from America to talk for a half-hour on a purely religious theme to a hundred young people.

The day appointed for the meeting came. We reached Riga, but no permit had come. The audience assembled and just at the last minute a telegram was handed in saying that I might speak "if the police of Riga were willing."

It must not be supposed that there were not many enlightened Christian people in Russia during these years of misrule. I remember a Princess ——, who attended the meetings in Riga. She belonged to one of the great families, who possessed large estates. This family had been so generous, kind and just to the peasants, that when, in the abortive revolution of 1905, the great houses of the nobility all around them were sacked and burned, theirs were spared.

Other families that I remember with pleasure and genuine admiration in St. Petersburg were those of Baron Nicolay and his sister, the baroness. They were among the most devout, evangelical Christians I ever knew. The story of their good deeds was in every mouth. The Baron used frequently to drop into the Christian Endeavor meeting in the British-American Church, which he said seemed to him like a "little piece of heaven." This family belonged to the Finnish nobility, and in Finland—poor, distracted, oppressed Finland—were and are a multitude of enlightened Christian men and women. Indeed, in spite of Russian tyranny, which with slight intermissions had lasted for a century, Finland had become one of the most highly educated and progressive countries in Europe.

Such people as these are still to be found in all parts of Russia, and when the angry waves of revolution and anarchy subside, and the missionaries of a free religion have a chance to do their leavening work, these men and women, I believe, will come to the front to lead the people into quieter and happier ways, and to establish the great, free, progressive republic of Russia.

League of Nations Made Certain

THE Peace Conference unanimously adopted the League of Nations project on January 25. President Wilson and Colonel House are the American members of the commission thereon.

The session opened at 3 P. M. with Premier Clemenceau in the chair. President Wilson made the opening address, a summary of which is printed on this page, telling the delegates of the nations that the conference had solemn obligations to make not only a present but a permanent settlement and that "select classes of men no longer direct the affairs of the world, but the fortunes of the world are now in the hands of the plain people." Mr. Lloyd George seconded Mr. Wilson's proposals, declaring that the people of the British Empire were emphatically behind the proposal, and Premier Orlando of Italy, Leon Bourgeois of France and delegates from Poland and China also supported the plan.

The Conference adopted this preliminary draft for the creation of the league:

> "The Conference, having considered the proposals for the creation of a League of Nations, resolved that:
> "It is essential to the maintenance of the world settlement which the associated nations are now met to establish that a League of Nations be established to promote international obligations and to provide safeguards against war.
> "This league should be created as an integral part of the general treaty of peace and should be open to every civilized nation which can be relied upon to promote its objects.
> "The members of the league should periodically meet in international conference and should have a permanent organization and secretaries to carry on the business of the league in the intervals between the conferences.
> "The Conference therefore appoints a committee, representative of the associated governments, to work out the details of the constitution and the functions of the league."

The plan for the committee provided for two representatives from each of the five great powers and five others to be chosen from among the delegates of the other nations represented in the Conference.

The Saturday session of the Conference also resulted in the appointment of a commission, which is to inquire and report upon the responsibility of the authors of the war, the breaches of international law by Germany and her allies, the degree of personal responsibility for these illegal actions and the constitution of a trial tribunal before which the guilty may be arraigned.

Another commission was appointed to work out the amount of reparation which the enemy countries ought to pay, what they are capable of paying and how it shall be paid; a commission was appointed to inquire and report upon the international régime for ports, waterways and railways, and a commission was appointed to "inquire into the conditions of employment from the international aspect and to consider the international means necessary to secure common action on matters affecting conditions of employment and to recommend the form of a permanent agency to continue such inquiry under the direction of the League of Nations."

PRESIDENT WILSON on January 20 was a guest of the French Senate at a luncheon in the Luxembourg Palace. The luncheon was served in the throne room, which was used for the first time since Napoleon banqueted his victorious generals 100 years ago.

There was no meeting of the Interallied Peace Conference on January 20, but the Supreme Council of the Conference took up the Russian situation, giving a hearing to Joseph Noulens, French Ambassador to Russia, who had recently returned from Petrograd, to give his personal testimony regarding Russian conditions. He was reported to have said that the Bolshevist power was an enemy of the Entente, that it was responsible for the Russian defection, and that it had furnished Germany with food, and had protested against the terms of the Allied-German armistice. He expressed the opinion that tyranny and terror, which are increasing daily, should place the plotters at Moscow and Petrograd outside the pale of humanity, and that no society of nations could deal with such a régime. On January 21 the Supreme Council heard Harold Scavenius, former Danish Minister to Russia. He was reported to have declared that the Bolshevist forces did not exceed 80,000 armed men. Other reports placed their army at 800,000 men. He was reported to have urged Allied military intervention in Russia.

The Supreme Council of the Peace Conference, on January 22, adopted a proposal submitted in writing by President Wilson which aimed to bring peace and order to Russia. A declaration in line with the President's suggestions was sent by wireless to all of the Russian factions, each of which was asked to send three delegates to meet at the Princes Islands, in the Sea of Marmora, the delegates of the nations represented at the Peace Conference. President Wilson's memorandum declares that the single object of the representatives of the powers is to help the Russian people and not to interfere with their right to settle their own affairs in their own way. He said: "It is clear to them that the troubles and distrust of the Russian people will steadily increase . . . unless order is restored and normal conditions of labor and transportation once more created, and they are keenly alive to the fact that Europe and the world cannot be at peace if Russia is not."

In regard to Poland France was reported to favor immediate armed intervention, but the Supreme Council decided to send a commission of eight delegates, two each from the United States, Great Britain, France and Italy, to proceed to Poland, investigate conditions and report.

Russian leaders in Paris resented the invitation from the Peace Conference for a conference of Russian factions at the Princes Islands. The anti-Bolshevist leaders seemed to regard the invitation as a welcome boon to the Bolshevists who were greatly in need of a respite, having been defeated on the northern front where their armies were reported to have joined the Allies in Esthonia and in the Urals at Perm, while peasant revolts were springing up against their control over wide areas and they were reported about to abandon Petrograd.

The Bolshevist foreign minister declaring that the Bolsheviki were victorious and were already restoring peace to Russia, sent a wireless request for more information, intimating that the Princes Islands were inaccessible but not implying intentions to refuse to send delegates. As we went to press, however, it appeared possible that the other factions would refuse the proposal to parley with the Reds.

The President's Address on the League of Nations

IN PRESENTING the subject of the League of Nations to the Conference the President said in part. "We have assembled for two purposes, to make the present settlements . . . and also to secure the peace of the world. . . . The League of Nations seems to me to be necessary for both of these purposes. There are many complicated questions . . . if I may judge by my own study of some of these questions they are not susceptible for confident judgments at present. It is therefore necessary that we should set up some machinery by which the work of this Conference should be rendered complete. . . .

"We are assembled under very peculiar conditions of world opinion. . . . It will not suffice to satisfy governmental circles anywhere. It is necessary that we should satisfy the opinion of mankind. . . . I do not need to draw for you the picture of how the burden (of war) has been thrown back from the front upon the older men, upon the women, upon the children, upon the homes of the civilized world. . . . We are bidden by these people to make a peace which will make them secure . . . to see to it that this strain does not come upon them again. . . .

"It is a solemn obligation on our part, therefore, to make permanent arrangements that justice shall be rendered and peace maintained. This is the central object of our meeting. Settlements may be temporary, but the action of the nations in the interest of peace and justice must be permanent."

The President here called attention to Germany's misuse of science and scholarship for the destruction of civilization, and declared that some watch must be organized to prevent a future perversion of learning.

He declared also that the United States, "with her great territory and her extensive sea borders" being less likely to attack was in a sense less interested in this subject than the other nations, but, he said, "The ardor of the United States for the society of nations is not an ardor springing out of fear or apprehension, but an ardor springing out of the ideals which have come in the consciousness of this war. In coming into this war the United States never for a moment thought that she was intervening in the politics of Europe . . . Asia . . . or any part of the world. Her thought was that all the world had now become conscious that there was a single cause of justice and liberty for men of every kind and place.

"Therefore, the United States should feel that its part in this war should be played in vain if there ensued upon it abortive European settlements. It would feel that it could not take part in guaranteeing those European settlements unless that guarantee involved the continuous superintendence of the peace of the world by the associated nations of the world. Therefore, it seems to me that we must . . . make this League of Nations a vital thing . . . always functioning in watchful attendance upon the interests of the nations. . . . And if we do not make it vital. . . . We shall disappoint the expectations of the peoples. That is what their thought centers upon. . . .

"Gentlemen, the select classes of mankind are no longer the governors of mankind. The fortunes of mankind are now in the hands of the plain people. . . . Satisfy them . . . and you have established peace. Fail to satisfy them, and no arrangement that you can make will either set up or steady the peace of the world."

The President here declared that the United States' representatives regarded the project of the League of Nations as the key note of "our purposes and ideals . . . which the associated nations have accepted as the basis of a settlement," and that "If we return to the United States without having made every effort in our power to realize this program, we should return to meet the merited scorn of our fellow-citizens. For . . . they expect their representatives to . . . be their servants."

Mr. Wilson said that the American delegation "would not dare abate a single item of the program which constitutes our instructions," and that they would not dare to compromise upo principle, "That we are the maste no peoples, but are here to see every people in the world shall c

Liquor Men Plan to Defeat Prohibition

THAT John Barleycorn, though defeated, is not yet regarded by his friends as wholly extinguished, is evident from an nt published in the New York of January 24, announcing the ization by hotel, real estate and ss men of "an Association Op- to National Prohibition." They pened an office in New York, and of the managers and officials of rgest hotels in the metropolis are g the leading members of the ation, the object of which, the explains, "is to cause the repeal, ssible, of the ratification of the al prohibition amendment, or, that, to attack its constitution- in the courts."

Week in the World's News

PAN ASKS FOR NO TERRITORY. In n address before the Japanese Par- ent January 21 by Viscount Uchida, ister for Foreign Affairs, Japan's tude toward the peace settlement outlined and established. Japan, he lared, had no aspiration but to seek consummation of a free and un- ered development of her national along the highway of justice and e. He declared that Japan looked forward to the rehabilitation of Russia as one of the great powers, and had no intention of interfering in the internal policies of Russia, and had no territorial ambitions in China to whose independence and territorial integrity she had pledged herself. He implied that it was Japan's intention to restore Kiauchau and Shantung Province to China, but said nothing about Korea, in which country Japan has been ruling with an iron hand. A movement is on foot among Koreans in America to petition the Peace Conference for relief from the systematic suppression of the Korean language, literature and press said to be practiced by the Japanese. China is also reported as planning to seek at Paris an annulment of the treaty of 1915 forced upon her by Japan, which America refused to recognize.

ORDER WINS IN GERMAN ELECTIONS. Complete returns from the German elections of January 19 indicated on January 24 that the Majority Socialists, with 164 votes and the German Democratic party with 77 votes would together have about 57 per cent. of the delegates to the National Convention, or about 241 seats to 180 of the other parties. Thirty-four women were elected as delegates. The old Centrist party which had been exclusively Catholic, opened its doors to Christians of all faiths and made a strong showing in the Rhineland, electing altogether 88 delegates. The result of the vote was reported as heartening the members of the Peace Conference in Paris, inasmuch as it gave a guarantee of the early establishment of a responsible government in Germany. It was announced on January 21 that the German National Convention was to be held at Weimar, convening on February 6, Weimar being chosen in order to have the convention as far as possible from the influence of the old Prussian spirit.

THE IRISH REPUBLIC. At Dublin, on January 21, the Sinn Feiners elected to the British Parliament, except those still in English prisons, met at the old Mansion House in Dublin to read the declaration of independence of free Ireland, the address to the free nations began: "The nation of Ireland having her national independence calls through her elected representatives, in Parliament assembled, upon every free nation to support the Irish Republic by recognizing Ireland's national status and her right to vindication at the Peace Conference. A resolution was drawn up demanding the withdrawal of the British garrisons from Ireland.

The Sinn Fein Parliament before adjourning elected a temporary Prime Minister and four other Ministers and elected Count Plunkett, Professor Edward De Valera and Arthur Griffith as Irish delegates to the Peace Conference.

LABOR UNREST IN BRITAIN. Industrial unrest is reported throughout the United Kingdom. Railway workers on January 22 were said to be threatening a strike, while a strike of 150,000 men was expected on the following day in the Yorkshire coalfields in response to a lockout of 40,000 men by operators. An agreement to cover the time of Government operation headed this strike off. The engineers were on strike in London and the labor situation in Great Britain appeared to be full of potential trouble, which was being fanned by small radical groups with Bolshevist tendencies.

KING MANUEL AGAIN? A monarchist revolution was reported on January 21 to have made considerable progress in the northern part of Portugal, a ministry having been established at Oporto, with Paiva Conceiro as President of the Council. Former King Manuel of Portugal was again proclaimed King. King Manuel and his wife have been domiciled in England since the Republican revolution in 1910 dethroned him.

There was a rumor on January 24 that the army had joined the revolution and that the monarchists controlled Lisbon. Latest reports as we go to press indicate that the monarchist movement had failed and the government at Lisbon was rapidly regaining control.

STATES FIGHT NATIONAL REGULATION. The new toll and long distance telephone rates put in force at midnight, January 20, on order of Postmaster General Burleson, were resisted by 10 of the states. Restraining orders were issued in New Jersey, Illinois, Missouri, Michigan, Nevada and Arizona. In Massachusetts the Public Service Commission held back the new rates pending inquiry, while in Florida an application for an injunction was to be heard, and a hearing had also been completed in Nebraska. On January 21 the Public Service Commission of New York State ordered its counsel to take court action to restrain the application of the new rates, the Commission holding that the Post Office Department had no greater power to initiate new rates than were granted by law to the companies which it was operating.

WILLIAMS RECOMMENDS NEW BANK LAWS. Controller of the Currency, John Skelton Williams, in his annual report recommended changes in the national banking law. He gave the total banking power of the United States, as of June, 1918, at $39,082,000,000, an increase for the year of 13 per cent. and an increase of nearly 60 per cent. since 1914. He recommended that officers of banks be prohibited from borrowing funds of the banks, that an officer making an unauthorized loan be disqualified and subject to a fine, that banks guilty of usury should be prosecuted, that the National Government should guarantee individual deposits in national banks not to exceed $5,000, that no national bank should be permitted to receive deposits in excess of 8 or 10 times the amount of its capital and surplus, that penalties should be provided in the criminal code for the making of false financial statements for the purpose of obtaining credit from the national banks and that the breaking and entering of a national bank for purposes of robbery be made a Federal crime.

AMERICAN BOLSHEVISTS. The Senate Committee on Propaganda was advised by the Military Intelligence Service that radical Socialists, the I. W. W. and kindred movements, all of which were agitating for a condition in this country similar to that which now exists in Russia, were growing rapidly and were represented by over 250 newspapers, the majority of which were printed in foreign languages.

HINES WANTS $750,000,000. The Director General of Railways, on January 24, submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury an estimate showing that the $500,000,000 revolving fund for 1918 expenses of the Railway Administration would be exceeded by $381,806,904, and asking that Congress provide an additional fund of $750,000,000 to cover this deficit and provide necessary funds for 1919.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The failure of the manufacturers and the unions to agree on standards of hours and wages caused a strike of women's and children's garment workers in New York City on January 21; 35,000 to 40,000 workers left their machines, and it was reported that 40,000 more were affected. . . . Secretary of War Baker, on January 22 ordered the release from Fort Leavenworth of 113 men who were serving sentences for refusing to perform military duty. These men were conscientious objectors whom a commission had declared sincere and they were ordered restored to military duty and honorably discharged.

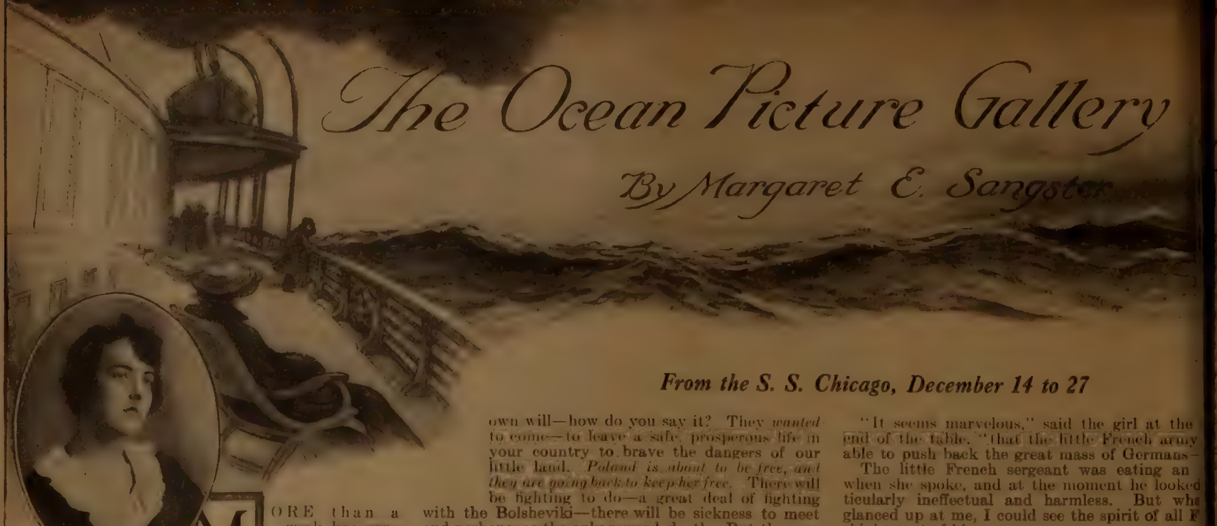
A Glimpse Into Next Week

THE Honeymoon House was in trouble, but next week's fiction story by Ruth Fargo shows how easy it was to fill the "Empty Spaces."

Many things have happened in the years between the 60's and today. Next week Charles Grant Miller tells of events and achievements from Lincoln to Wilson.

Next week, too, John Cameron gets a week-end furlough and plans an interesting call.

And also next week Dr. Milford W. Foshay tells of "The Expediency of the Ascension."



The Ocean Picture Gallery

By Margaret E. Sangster

From the S. S. Chicago, December 14 to 27

MORE than a week has gone by since we left New York and for the first time the sun is shining. During that week we have fought against rain storms and hail; we have ploughed through ice and sleet and snow, while many of us have been cross, or frankly bored, or rather terribly seasick. But now that the sun has come out, we have forgotten every unpleasant hour.

I wish that I might show you the sea as it is today. It stretches endlessly on every side, a gray-green sheet of water that deepens, in spots, to black, and is silver-pale in its high lights. The sky above the sea is like the background of a Maxfield Parrish painting; all deep oranges and creamy yellows and rose-shot sapphires. And though there is nothing in sight but the sea and the sky, one finds one's self pretending that some marvelous, enchanted land lies just beyond the far line of the horizon.

Our boat goes steadily on its way, a business-like, unemotional bit of machinery, through the magic of the sea. It seems almost strange to me, as I sit in my deck chair, nearly breathless with the wonder of it all, that the boat does not feel some particle of the thrill that is catching at my heart! It seems strange that it can go so changelessly through the glamour of a dream coming true.

When I came on board the S. S. Chicago a week ago I had some very definite plans about the first letter that I would send back to you, friends of mine. The plans had to do with sitting down every day, and writing out a connected narrative that would tell, in detail, of the life on shipboard. But after a very few hours I discovered that it would be impossible to write such a narrative—and make it true. For life on shipboard is not a connected thing. It is a series of incidents, some highly colored, some more than tragic; incidents that bear little or no relation to each other. Life on shipboard is like a picture gallery. One glances at an exhibit, forms some sort of an opinion about it and passes on, after a moment, to the next exhibit. And as the portrait of a smiling child is often hung beside a frowning bit of winter landscape, so are the glimpses of life arranged on board a ship.

ON THE first afternoon out, just as we swung away from the dock, I heard a sound of cheering. It seemed to come from quite a distance and I followed it blindly, until I reached the forward deck. There I stopped and the cheering seemed to be directly below me.

From the forward deck, one can look down into the steerage. It was foggy on that first afternoon out, and I glanced down through a curtain of mist into the very heart of a picture that I do not think I will ever forget; the picture of a band of soldiers dressed in scarlet coats, and black trousers, and quaint square caps of a peculiar slate blue—a picture outlined, in a startlingly vivid way, against the fog. The soldiers were cheering when I first saw them, but after a moment they stopped cheering and began to sing a slow, wistful song—a song that fairly throbbed with vague longings and broken hopes. I felt my eyes growing dim as I listened to it, although I did not quite understand why I wanted to cry. For I did not learn the story of the soldiers until I met one of their young officers a few days later.

"They are Polish," he told me proudly. "There are five hundred of them on this boat and they are all going back to Poland. The same number are leaving the United States, every week, for Poland. They were recruited by us and they came, each one, of his own will—how do you say it? They wanted to come—to leave a safe, prosperous life in your country to brave the dangers of our little land. Poland is about to be free, and they are going back to keep her free. There will be fighting to do—a great deal of fighting with the Bolsheviki—there will be sickness to meet and perhaps, as the only reward, death. But they are going back—because they want to go!"

I heard later, and from another man, the story of the young officer himself. I heard of the promising medical career that he was giving up to answer the call of Poland; of the girl who was waiting, somewhere in the Middle West, for him to do his duty and come back to her. And I have heard, since then, the stories of the eight other young officers. Each story is a story of sacrifice and idealism.

I know, now, why the song that the soldiers sang could make me cry. It was the soul back of the music that called out to the soul of me. For each one of those five hundred soldiers who are going back, every week, to Poland, is going as a Crusader goes out upon a holy quest.

THERE was a burial at sea a few nights ago. It was a French boy of eighteen, in the steerage, who died. He had been very ill with pneumonia, but he put up a brave fight, for he was trying hard to live until he could see, once more, his native land. But the weather was cold and the trip was long, and he could not wait. And so he died, half-way across the ocean—a pitiful little tragedy of unsatisfied longing!

The sea seemed very dark and stormy the night that they buried him. It was raining hard and there was no ray of light from the blank wall of the sky. And as I lay in my berth, looking out of the porthole, I couldn't help thinking of him. And it seemed to me that there was something almost unfair about it all—something uncombatable and cruel. A boy of eighteen is such an atom against the wideness of the ocean!

I sat up in my berth and looked out across the troubled black water that reached farther, almost, than my imagination could reach. And suddenly, strangely, I found the words of an old hymn ringing in my heart—words that gave a splendid assurance—

> "There's a wideness in God's mercy,
> Like the wideness of the sea—"

I looked out of the porthole again. And all at once the dark mystery of the ocean seemed more understandable, and infinitely kinder. And I went to sleep at last, and quite happily with the knowledge that the little lonely boy was being lowered, not into the coldness of the sea, but into merciful, waiting Arms.

THERE are a great many French soldiers on board the Chicago. Quiet men they are, mostly, with serious eyes and lips that try to smile. They have lived, all of them, through horrors that we cannot dream—horrors that no one but a French soldier could dream. I often find myself wondering that they even try to smile.

One of them sits at our table. He is a little sergeant with two wound stripes on his right sleeve and a croix de guerre pinned above his heart. It was not until luncheon on the fourth day out that he spoke to me about the war. For he has always been much more interested in my plans and ideas than in the part that he has played in a world drama. It was only when I spoke of the French Alpine Chasseurs, known as the "Blue Devils," that his reserve crumbled.

"I have two brothers in those regiment . . ." he told me. "One is still wit' them—"

"And the other?" I questioned softly.

"He were keeled in 1915," answered the little sergeant. "Mais—once there were six of us. T'ree have been keeled, and one have been a preesonier for four years in Germany—" he paused suddenly.

I didn't ask any more questions. But some ten minutes later a girl at the other end of the table mentioned the battle of the Marne.

"It seems marvelous," said the girl at the end of the table, "that the little French army able to push back the great mass of Germans—

The little French sergeant was eating an when she spoke, and at the moment he looked ticularly ineffectual and harmless. But wh glanced up at me, I could see the spirit of all F shining out of his eyes.

"We could afford to die," he told me slowly. could afford to die—yes! But we could not affo lose!"

I HAD never been away from home, befor Christmas time. Christmas, to me, had al meant a wonderful gift tree, and the family stoc hung in a row, and holly wreaths in every festive dow. Christmas, to me, had always meant fra ground pine and the white sparkle of mistletoe be it had meant a glitter of snow on the frozen s tinkle of sleigh-bells in the air, and a warm, spic grance coming from the direction of the kitchen. the thought of being away from all of these t made me creep down to my berth, all alone, o afternoon before Christmas. I wasn't the only who stole away on that afternoon. A great many ple came to the Christmas eve dinner table with dened eyes and tremulous mouths. A Christma dinner is, fundamentally, a home time, and we a rather silently. And then we drifted out, one o at a time, to the deck.

It was there, I think, that I caught the first f of the spirit of Christmas. As I leaned agains rail and looked down at the stars that shone refl in the water, I found myself remembering Other Star. For the night was peculiarly calm an still beauty of it was of the sort that catches at the

At midnight the sound of a ringing bell calle in from the deck. I went in slowly and found there was a little religious service going on—a vice to usher in the birthday of the Christ. It w service that every one attended, despite race o ligion or creed. I do not think I shall ever f the solemn charm of it.

The service was held in the dining hall, the la room on the ship. The electricity had been tu off for the night, but there were dim lamps on tables and by the flickering light of them I lo about me. There were Americans, quite a fe them, in the room. And there were many Fr people. There were Polish army officers and Po guese officers and Italian officers. I saw a Chi nursemaid in native costume, with a little girl in arms, and a group of very earnest Japanese chants. I saw representatives of the oldest relig and the newest. And they all knelt to that God on Christmas Eve and always—is "on the ocean the same as on the land."

Christmas Day came up radiantly out of the s a gorgeous blue and gold day! There weren't stockings to be emptied, or any packages to be tied, so we girls—there were four of us in the one stateroom—lay in bed rather quietly and had morning chocolate brought in to us. It was whi was lying there that I thought of the little childre the ship who had been deprived of their Christ and, in being sorry for them, I almost forgot t sorry for myself.

We did not go upstairs until luncheon time then we went straight to the dining-hall. F Frenchmen and one old Frenchwoman sat at the t with us and one of the girls in our party had fo five cards in her writing case that she had laid at t places. So when we took our seats, we were met storm of greetings—greetings that we understood, though the tongue in which they were spoken w strange one to us. All formality disappeared at t Christmas luncheon; we heard from one man of wife and baby; from another, of the sweetheart is waiting for him in a little town near the Spa border; from the little old woman of her three gra children, and we, in turn, half shyly showed them photographs of our loved ones at home.

Self-Expression Through Flower Gardening

By LEWIS EDWIN THEISS

LOWER gardening should afford the maximum of pleasure because in the raising of flowers the gardener can give free rein to his fancy, can express himself in living colors even artist expresses himself with artificial pigments. getable gardening this is not possible, or at least sible only to a limited extent. For ease of cul- vegetables must be arranged in stiff and method- ows. To secure maximum production, inter- ing and companion cropping and succession ing must be practiced, regardless of considera- that are purely esthetic. But in flower garden- ne can arrange one's plants in any fashion one es and mass them in any way that seems desirable. t even here there are limitations. In "The Story Other Wise Man," Dr. Henry Van Dyke says of ouse of Artaban, "It was, as the house of a man d be, an expression of the character and spirit of aster." That is the limitation that should gov- nd control the making of our flower beds and all hat has to do with the home and the home plot. ould express the character and spirit of the family dwells therein.

do this is not so easy a matter as one might think. s it desirable that it should be easy. For, to quote Liberty H. Bailey, "A person will get from a gar- hat he puts into it." Hence if your flower garden be a success, it is of the first importance that a conception of the work be formulated at the out-thout a clear conception of what he wishes to do, ower gardener cannot expect to derive any very satisfaction from the development of his home

Before he begins to plant, he must have a defin- an. And this plan, like the sketch of an artist, e most satisfying when it most exactly expresses haracter of the person who made it. In short, plan for your garden must express what you your- re. If your nature is cold and austere, you will tless take most delight in a stiff and formal gar-

If your disposition is friendly and cheerful, you shun a formal garden and plant for informal ty and hominess.

this is set down to emphasize the point that you ot make a successful garden—though it may be tiful enough—either by hiring some one else to it for you or by planting according to rules. In cases the result will express somebody else's ideas ot your own. Yet, as in writing English one must ood style and diction, so in expressing one's self in rs, one must use good taste.

MUST always be borne in mind that the object of ower gardening is really to create a picture. n we set out bulbs and roots and shrubs and trees t our homes, we do so not merely that we may and enjoy the particular bulbs and roots and bs and trees we put out, but also to improve the arance of our homes—in short, to increase the rial effect of our home plots.

hat we shall decide to plant is purely a matter of onal likes and dislikes. What one should plant is, first of all, the thing that one loves the most. If you prefer wild flowers to stately cultivated plants, by all means plant wild flowers. Or if you prefer old-fashioned blossoms to the more modern flowers, fill your grounds with the blooms of your grandmother's day. The point is not what sort of material you use, but what kind of a picture you make with it.

WHILE no hard and fast rules can be laid down for the gardener to follow, the principles that should guide him in his planting, like rules of rhetoric for the writer, must be clearly kept in mind. Every yard should be a picture. It should be one thing, one area, with every feature contributing its part to one strong and homogeneous effect. There are two styles of planting, in one of which plants and trees are scattered promiscuously over the entire yard, while in the other they are massed into a framework to give effectiveness to the picture of home and comfort.

A thing that is well planned and made, whether it be a suit of clothes or a home plot, is harmonious throughout, both in design and color. The surest test of any part of a whole is whether or not it catches the eye and distracts the attention, whether or not it sticks out like a sore thumb with a rag on it. If it does, it is not in harmony with the remainder of the picture. The satisfaction of a garden does not depend on the area, nor, happily, on the cost or rarity of the plants.

Vegetable gardening is an activity denied to many of us; but any one can have at least a small flower garden. The roofs of city houses are excellent places for the growing of flowers. A few boxes of earth planted with climbing vines will transform these unsightly places into spots of beauty. Friends of mine who lived in an apartment overlooking the Hudson transformed the unattractive roof of the house in which they lived into a thing of beauty, merely by planting a few climbing plants and bushy shrubs. And here they spent the hot summer evenings, looking down upon the cool waters at their feet. I have seen ugly roofs in the tenement district transformed by the cultivation of a few well-chosen plants. Window boxes, fortunately, are not so rare as roof boxes. They lend to the city home that added charm that a border of flowers gives to the home in the country.

It is in town or country, however, that flower gardening offers the most enjoyment—the most because in these places one has an ample canvas on which to make his flower picture, his effect of a charming and comfortable home. Bearing in mind that the object of flower beds is not to attract attention to the flowers themselves, but to enhance the beauty of the home area, one will make one's planting in masses along the borders rather than in plots in the middle of lawns and other open spaces. And he will so arrange his shrubs and plants as to set off whatever vista or vistas can be secured on his grounds. In the ordinary town yard of 50x150 feet it might at first glance seem idle to talk about the forming of vistas, especially when houses crowd close on every side. Yet it is a poor yard, indeed, that does not afford some beautiful point of view. This view should be enhanced and emphasized by proper planting. If any one doubts that his yard has some picturesque vista in it, let him remember what occurs when one uses a camera. Photographs often reveal the most charming bits of scenery in the very heart of what appears to be a most commonplace region. The reason is that the picture is condensed in the photograph and the mind grasps its meaning at once, whereas the general landscape is so big that one is distracted by individual objects. The photograph sets a limit to the scene. It frames it, and thereby cuts off all extraneous and confusing or irrelevant landscapes. In looking for the vista in one's yard, one must see as through the eye of a camera. And to heighten the effect of the vista, one must plan also as through the camera's eye, massing shrubs and plants so as to shut out all that is irrelevant and thus bring into prominence the view it is intended to emphasize.

The suggestion that one plant so as to frame his house, outline his boundaries, and emphasize the most pleasing view, however, is merely the suggestion of a principle and not the statement of a rule. Rules for flower gardening are impossible for the very reason that the highest form of flower gardening is an expression of self. The combination of plants and flowers that will exactly satisfy one heart, will not fully please another. And as we shall derive the greatest satisfaction from our flower gardening exactly in proportion as we plant those flowers that most appeal to us, in the manner that best pleases our fancy, one individual's treatment of his home grounds must inevitably differ from that of another. But the difference will be in details, not in principle.

Fortunately, Nature has been as prolific in flower forms as she has been in her other manifestations. There are bulbs and roots and shrubs and trees to be had in such profusion and variety that every gardener has only to search long enough and he will find exactly the flower material he desires for his planting.

Flower gardening is one of the joys and benefits of life that we have slighted. Just as we have passed through the "Queen Anne" style of architecture in the building of houses, so we have been going through a flowerless period in the development of our home sites. Like the Quaker with his severely plain broadcloth, we have run to unadorned stretches of lawn. But we are coming back to the day beloved by our grandmothers, when flowers banked the homesteads and made the surrounding grounds places of charm and beauty.

The movement back to the soil has more in it than a mere desire to grub in the ground. It is the mental revolt against the artificial stereotyped life of the modern city. It is a revolution for individual "self determination." And whether the gardener live in a great city or in the open country, the planting and growing of flowers will be found a most enjoyable method of self-expression. Indeed, the Divine plan for man's happiness contemplated that he should live in a garden, "to tend it and to dress it."

The author refers interested readers to "A Woman's Hardy Garden," by Mrs. H. R. Ely, and to the "Manual of Gardening," by Dr. Bailey.

Real Democracy in Council

FOR the first time in history a great Peace Conference is assembled with no king, no prince of the blood at the table, no trappings of royalty, no ostentation.

This absence strikingly typifies the new era and gives promise that at last a world peace may be erected without consideration of dynastic factors which have been such fruitful seeds of wars in other days.

Of great import, too, is the presence of representatives of the press of the world, who have their positions in the room forming a part of the main chamber, taking down the proceedings. They represent the public directly, and through their attendance, against which strong influences had been furtively directed, recognition is given to the part that public opinion has in the final formation of the relations which are to make the rule of the many supreme over the rule of the few.

The Road to Church Unity

"THE time has come when the churches need to decide, not upon a platform upon which to stand, but upon a road on which we can go forward with a united front!" These were the vigorous words of one of the speakers at an informal Conference on Church Unity, held in New York on January 21. It was a notable gathering and brought eminent leaders in many different denominations together to discuss ways and means of furthering the great Unity program which is today the absorbing theme in a majority of the Evangelical churches of America.

It was explained at the outset that the object sought by the Christian Herald in arranging such a gathering was to ascertain how the most helpful and effective service might be rendered to the Unity movement. For something over a year the Unity tide has been rising, and in various cities it has demonstrated its strength in large and representative assemblages. Yet, although it carries a powerful appeal to all denominations and has warm advocates among them all, thus far there has been no definite plan of work presented. Like the Israelites coming out of Egypt, the churches had begun their march, but were sore afraid and hesitating, looking behind them with lingering eyes upon the old, easy, familiar surroundings. Even the leaders were hesitant and appealing, when the voice came to them which said: "Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward!"

And this, in effect, was the decision which was emphasized in all the addresses. Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, representing the Disciples of Christ, spoke strongly in behalf of a vigorous policy. It was peculiarly fitting, he said, that the Christian Herald, an interdenominational organ, should have undertaken to present the cause of Unity to the churches. Denominationalism must ultimately give way to interdenominationalism, the denominational press to an interdenominational press, and the denominational school to the interdenominational school. "It may be difficult for us," he said, "to think in terms of unity; but a divided church cannot function for the needs of today. What is wanted now is not a platform but a road upon which we can go forward with a united front!" He proposed that the present Conference should be followed by a four-day gathering in the coming summer, without formal program, to bring forward the key men of the various churches for prayer and conference. If the world is to be brought to Christ, it must be by a united Church. In the same vein, Rev. Arthur J. Brown, of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, said: "The sentiment of the layman is urging cooperation, indeed Union, of some of the denominations." He told of Chinese Christians who declared that they did not propose to be held apart by our church divisions. Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin said he was emphatically a Church Union Baptist. Every forward movement looks beyond conventionality. Misplaced emphasis has been laid on forms.

Dr. William P. Merrill, of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York, said the Christian Herald could serve the cause of Unity most effectively by constant agitation and by challenging the denominations to declare what they held as the real essentials in Christianity. "Like Charles Lamb," he said, "they are sentimentally disposed to harmony, but organically incapable of keeping in tune." The rapid progress in the formation of a League of Nations, to bring together as one the political powers of the world, is an example for us of the indispensability of Unity to success. Why should the Christian Church trail along in the old way?" Dr. Thomas H. Mackenzie, of the Reformed Church in America, spoke encouragingly of the measure of Church Unity we already have. Our divisions are due to human nature, he held. The existence of the interdenominational Christian Herald he regarded in itself a proof of the progressive Unity of the Church. Dr. Wallace MacMullen, speaking as a Methodist, pointed out that our historic divisions are rooted in temperamental differences. We do not want a unity that means uniformity, but a coming together on the fundamentals.

In the addresses there were suggestions pointing to a basis which the Church could utilize as a simple and effective, constructive program. This, the speakers evidently believed, would appeal to all the denominations. To spread it far and wide should be the mission of every Evangelical church in America. It is a road upon which all may travel and not a platform. Platforms have their uses, but a clear path that leads to a definite goal is what the situation demands.

If permitted, we shall publish in coming issues of the Christian Herald the addresses delivered at the Conference, and believe they will be found deserving of the widest audience.

Latent Talent

THE recent invention which renders wireless transmission independent of atmospheric conditions and the discovery by which seven messages can be sent simultaneously over a telephone wire are striking instances of latent possibilities long unsuspected.

For thousands of years we did not even suspect the existence of electricity, and, being ignorant, derived no advantage from it.

If we had never heard music, we would say that it was merely the dream of a simpleton to expect the most beautiful harmony of sounds from a combination of wood, intestines of a dead cat and hairs from the tail of a horse. But the violin, plus the man who knows how, accomplishes the wonderful result.

Active talent is the source of both quantity and quality of production, and that does not lie in capital but in men, and it usually is latent.

Every man has power and courage, but not all of them know it.

David had it, and knew it, and licked Goliath.

Foch was not plucked from the "four hundred."

And Lincoln came from a log cabin.

Not only once in a while, but very often, Nature takes a particularly "raw" bit of material and shows up what is in it. It is a suggestion for us to do likewise with ourselves.

The greatest waste in the world is the unused brains.

The Irish Declaration

THE convening of an Irish parliament and the issuance by it of a plea for international recognition and an independent Ireland open up a far-stretching vista of tremendous possibilities.

The British Government, remembering the tragic setting of the proclamation of an Irish republic on Easter Monday, 1916, has wisely permitted present events to take their course.

So far the proceedings at Dublin have been limited to words—significant words, pregnant with deep meaning, it is true—but words, nevertheless. But words, if righteous and sustained, are mighty forces.

Tomorrow, or the next day, or the day after that, the words, it may well be expected, will be translated into deeds. Upon the scope of those deeds and upon their direction will hinge the future policy of the British Empire.

Those deeds not only the British Government but the world will await with something more than a casual interest.

From Wednesday to Saturday

YOU will notice that this issue of the Chr Herald, although reaching you as usual, is Saturday, February 8, instead of Wedne February 5. For a number of weeks the pape reached you late, by reason of causes beyond the bility of immediate remedy. We take this meth answering letters protesting at this delay whic could do little to prevent. The issue date of a azine is one of its choicest assets. We have publ on Wednesday for over thirty years; yet facts h be faced, and it was finally decided to send the i to press on the same day, to mail them as we been doing, but to advance the date, three from Wednesday to Saturday. Thus we confid expect that all of you will receive your paper before the date it bears.

The German Republic

THE newest wonder of the world is the U States of Germany. Through the elec recently held this achievement seems ass It is a triumph for the people of Germany a triumph for all humanity.

Having received the assurances at the polls of confidence of nearly fifty per cent. of the Ger voters the Ebert government has set itself to task of framing the Fatherland's future. Under proposed Constitution a President will be ele for a term of seven years, and he will appoint a net. Provision is made for a Reichstag comp of two chambers, one to be a popular chamber the others chosen by the States. The people's ber shall be composed of deputies of the un German people, elected by secret, direct and versal ballot. All men and women over twenty of age may vote. The lower chamber will be ch on the principle of proportionate representation. upper chamber shall be composed of representat of the various States. The duration of the legisla mandate of both chambers would be three yea

The eight separate republics within the federat will be: Berlin, Prussia, Silesia, Brandenburg, L Saxony, Westphalia, Hesse, Rhineland and Ger Austria (combined.) Berlin and its immediate virons hereafter will be a separate republic indepe ent of Prussia, of which it has been hitherto the ca tal.

All this seems unbelievable, but the world is mo with tremendous strides toward liberty.

It is not alone in Germany that the spirit of government asserts itself, but in all lands there rapidly developing a new sense of freedom.

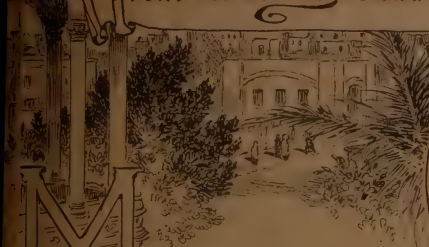
India Again in Famine's Grasp



A Loud Call to Christian Herald Readers from the United Missionaries for Help

By REV. R. A. HUME, Ahmednagar, India

MISSIONARIES, native Christians and even government officials in India will not soon forget the immense service rendered to this country by the Christian ld, its staff, its constituency and by its owner, late Dr. Louis Klopsch, in the great famine of -1901. Probably no other one philanthropic ce to the cause of India has equaled the famine elf then rendered through your influential paper. his very day, a few missionaries are still receiving niary help for some orphans from Christian Her- patrons who began such aid in 1900. But the fruit of your service is in an army of Christian ng men and women who were Christian Herald ans, but now are men and women, a large part hom are physically well, educated, active members urches; and some of whom are serving as Chris- teachers, preachers, doctors, artizans and nurses.

new emergency has come upon India, on account which Indian missionaries again appeal to the istian Herald and its readers for sympathy and ve efforts for relief. War-strain, famine and a ful epidemic of influenza have combined to bring his country a distress such as I have never seen in missionary service of forty-four years, though I e been through three famines and several epi- ics of plague.

here are 40 meteorological stations which regu- report to government. From 39 of these stations report is that in 1918 a very serious deficiency ainfall occurred. In consequence even now great ress exists in wide areas. This must steadily in- se until rain may begin to fall in June, 1919, and the next early crop begins to be harvested in gust.

hile this lack of rain has greatly diminished the ilable amount of food required for dense popula- s, the most trying economic consideration is that t multitudes of farmers and day laborers, whose port comes mainly from agriculture, have little o money with which to buy food. And the class nected with Missions, which is particularly hard is the very large number of Indian Christian workers in Mission employ, who have been re- ving only moderate incomes on which they could support their families in normal times, but who ply cannot manage now, when grain costs from ee to four times as much as in normal times. No s appeals more to the sympathetic aid of Missions n this worthy and large community. As in 1899- 1, now also thousands of orphans are in pitiable d of succor and training.

The acute distress, caused by prices of grain which unprecedentedly high, is aggravated by an unpar- led epidemic of influenza which not only takes hundreds of thousands of people and leaves tens thousands of orphans, but makes breadwinners able to work.

The government of India has begun relief measures. t cooperating non-official relief efforts supple- nting governmental measures are absolutely nec- ary. This is shown by the action taken by many lividual Missions, by Representative Councils of issions in various Provinces, and by the National issionary Council, which, on Nov. 18, 1918, passed e following resolution:

"In view of the serious food conditions in parts of dia, the Rev. R. A. Hume, M.A., D.D., should d in an effort for securing relief."

The American Marathi Mission of Western India s passed the following resolution:

"War, famine and pestilence are combining to ake the present season in India the most serious d distressing for a hundred years. The war has pleted India's stocks of grain and doubled and ebled the prices of the necessities of life. Lack of in since June in thirty-nine out of forty districts of dia has already caused a serious shortage of food reducing the early harvest of this year. The latter ins have practically failed, and fields sown during e past months are now withering. For our own lission districts we do not expect anywhere more an one-fourth of the grain usually grown. In some acts the fields are not even sown. The getting of fodder for the cattle is a problem perhaps more serious than the getting of grain for men. Into this distress has come influenza in a deadly pneumonic form, laying low hundreds of thousands and carrying off thousands of breadwinners, leaving widows and orphans behind to weep and starve. Many more thousands who are recovered are weakened in body and unable to do their proper work. Government recognizes the seriousness of the situation, and is dealing with the situation as a whole, arranging for the bringing of food and providing work for the needy. But there are orphans to be cared for, the sick are to be ministered to, and those who may get their bare food will need clothes and other things that famine camps will not and cannot give."

Two months ago the Representative Council of Missions in the Bombay Presidency passed the following resolution:

"That in view of the serious prospect of famine, this Council urges all the Missions to express their willingness to assist government, as in former famines, by cooperation in measures of relief; that the Executive Committee take any measures which may appear necessary."

In view of this resolution the Executive Committee have appointed a new Christian Herald Famine Relief Committee, of which Dr. R. A. Hume is chairman and Rev. A. A. Parker, Methodist Mission, Bombay, is Secretary.

In view of such action on Nov. 23rd I sent you a cablegram as follows:

"Christian Herald,
Bible House, New York.

"Famine, pestilence large parts India. Increasing nine months. Private relief must supplement Government measures. As in 1900 India urgently appeals to Christian Herald Committee formed Bombay. Hume Chairman, Methodist Parker Secretary. Send relief promptly. Address: Fernstalk, Bombay."

Government officials anticipate that the economic distress in 1919 will be very severe. One high official lately said that he anticipates that it will be a more severe distress than any which India has experienced in fifty years.

The highest official in the Ahmednagar district recently wrote me:

> "With reference to our conversation about famine, I must inform you that the Kharip crop, i. e. the monsoon crop, has entirely failed over nearly the whole district. Owing to showers there has been a fairly large sowing of Winter crops, but unless good rain falls this will also entirely fail, and there is no sign of rain. It will need good rain to make anything of this crop. If this fails—and all my arrangements are now being made in anticipation of its failure—we must have a very intense famine; much heavier famine than any we have had since 1899-1901; the situation is aggravated by the very high prices prevailing.
> "If therefore you are able to obtain funds, as you did before, for relief they will be most helpful. You have administered such funds before regardless of creed, and the public has complete reliance in you.
> C. A. Beyts,
> "Collector of Ahmednagar."

The government of India and of the Province of Bombay have recently expressed a desire that appeals for non-official aid should be addressed to America and Great Britain.

The Bombay municipality, in welcoming a new Governor, said: "We cannot avoid referring to the fact that the city, along with other places in the Presidency, is now passing through a time of distress and anxiety, owing to the failure of the seasonal rains, and that in common with so many other parts of the world we have suffered severely from an epidemic of influenza with a very high mortality."

The strong Christian Herald Relief Committee which has been organized will soon begin some arrangements. But until some relief money arrives not much can be done. We all shall very eagerly await the outcome of my cablegram, of this letter, and of other letters on this subject which will go to you. I have engaged passage for America via the Pacific for the close of February. So I cannot expect to receive, before I sail, a written reply to this letter, but I do earnestly request a cabled answer addressed to "Hume, Ahmednagar, India." While I am in India, I shall do what I can. When I leave, the Committee will make another chairman of this Christian Herald Committee. When I reach America about the end of May, I shall there push efforts for relief so far as possible.

Very heartily thanking the Christian Herald and its readers for their former invaluable service, and earnestly appealing for help in our present emergency,

R. A. Hume,
Chairman Christian Herald Committee which has been formed by the Executive Committee of the Bombay Representative Council of Missions.

Before this letter was received, the Christian Herald, responding to the cabled appeals, had forwarded to Dr. Hume's Committee in Bombay $5,000 in anticipation of contributions. That sum should be followed by other remittances as rapidly as the contributions are received. All the suffering districts will be helped as far as the means at the Committee's disposal will permit. To be effective in saving life, the relief must be given promptly. We are confident that our readers, comprehending the urgency of the need, will do their share with their usual promptitude and liberality.

These contributions for the India Famine Relief work are acknowledged:

A Prophet—Not Without Honor

A SHORT STORY BY GEORGE GILBERT

Illustration by Varian and Osborne

IN THE after-benediction hush in Bethel Chapel Rev. Albert Thorndale went to his wonted station at the door, ready to greet the people as they passed out. He felt displeased with his sermon, with himself; with the failure of the new organist, the good choir he had drilled so faithfully, to produce the results he had so fondly hoped for.

"A splendid sermon and service," Anson Barksdale, general manager of the big colliery that was the only industry of Anthraton, complimented Thorndale. Barksdale was the business hub of the community, as spokesman for the Consolidated Company—a modest, square-dealing man who but a few months before had displaced a former grasping, unpopular general manager. He it was who had been chief among the men to bring Thorndale to preach in Bethel Chapel.

"Thank you," the pastor answered; "but I thought the sermon went a bit over the people's heads. I feel that I did not reach their inner lives."

"That will come in time," Barksdale encouraged, giving place to a burly man, whose gnarled, powder-marked hands set him off for a coal miner. He was David Prtherch, for whose good opinion Thorndale was especially solicitous, as Old David, gruff, often hasty-tempered, was loyal, true, warm of heart, and the leader of the Anthraton deep-level workers.

The miner's hand squeezed the pastor's. His left stole up to pat Thorndale's shoulder.

"'Twas—no'bout so bad; you're a-warmin' to us, lad," and his grim brows wrinkled into a smile that came from the heart out.

"Only warming?" Thorndale began, regretfully; then, with sudden decision, he bent over and whispered: "Wait in the pastor's room; I wish to have a word with you and a few others, Mr. Prtherch."

In like manner Thorndale accosted and kept in Mike Polaski, the giant Slovene, real foil to David, whose Welsh blood and ways represented the old-time miners, while Mike stood for the latter-day order in the coalfields.

To them were added, when Thorndale seated himself at the head of the table that centered the little room, Alois Maxim, a Slovak, Andrew Alexis, a White Russian; Jack O'Neil, descendant of a pioneer Belfaster, and others. Big Mike was at the right side of the pastor's chair—the wide-armed, softly-padded one the men's class had given him when he had arrived in Anthraton six months before. Old David sat on Thorndale's left—the heart-side, as he called it with his loving Welsh whimsy.

"I have called you men together, the flock's pick," Thorndale said abruptly, "to tell you I am going to resign."

"Na! Na!" exploded Old David, his hand seeking the pastor's own. And it was Old David who put period to the amazed silence by demanding: "Why?"

"I feel I'm not the man for this parish."

"Ye said that the first time," O'Neil rasped.

But it was Maxim whose acid bit deepest: "Ain't ve for you good enuff?"

Thorndale stormed at him. "'Good enough!' Haven't I done my best—organized a splendid choir, had put in a fine organ, built up the Sabbath school—brought in an organist so good she is called upon to give recitals in other churches roundabout—refused two good offers from other churches——"

"Easy, lad," from David, his finger-tips drumming "Men o' Harlech" on the oaken table-top.

It was Big Mike whose crucial hammer-blow smote through David's plea for moderation:

"Ya! Ya!! Dot orgel-player voman. Who make oop money her to pay?"

"It comes vrum Barksdale," Maxim gritted accusingly. "Dtaht means vrum Consolidated Coal Company!"

"I said so frankly when I hired Miss Cavish," Thorndale gave them back squarely; "you made no protest then. . . ."

"We're makin' nane noaw," Old David said grim

"You, too!" and Thorndale whirled on the o man who was pursing his thin lips to blow out whisker-stirring breath toward the ceiling.

"I'll give to 'im straight," O'Neil thrust in wit "let be, David," and his great arm propelled a hair fist that, applied to Old David's breast, sent th Welsher into his chair's depths with as resistless force as the piston-rod of an engine exerts; "Bark dale-Consolidated, pays th' organist—an' a lot things. It makes us all feel you're like th' last past we had—owned by th' Consolidated. There, it out, an' Lord help us all and all."

"So that's it?" and Thorndale's eyes roved ove the accusing faces. "Oh, men! to hold such thought of me, with miner blood in me, who loves you all! and his hands went out in a wide appeal to them ove the table. But he only saw David's lips purse as h hemmed, haughed and expelled breath with a quee whistling sound. The others got up and stampe out stormily.

Thorndale wheeled on David, who sat still, combin his tangled beard with spatulate digits, and demanded

"Do you believe this charge they bring agains me? What do you want? That I be biased for yo men, against the company and Barksdale?"

"Na! Na!! We know you must be meen'ster o high an' low, foursquare, firm. If ye could mak th' men feel you're with them, like . . . Oh, dominee we be just hard, dynamitin', rock-breakin' geezers and we want our parson to gi' us th' touch o' hi shoulder as he marches along to glory wi' us."

"But am I not old Anse Thorndale's grandson—Anse the miner?"

"I know! He was mine bully when I was a break lad. We all loved him. But what do th' ginnies like Big Mike, Alexis and them know of him? Your folks left these hills when you were a youngling; you are city-bred. The men feel. . . ."

"But tell me what I've done to chill them."

"You're too correct; wear soft clothes, have soft

. soft ways, soft speech—like Barksdale. top it all, you've brought onto us an organist, for with the Consolidated's money—as if we 't 'a' paid the shot oursen! Are we wage-s religious paupers, then, that others pays our "

was Old David, in the west breast working of h Shaft 8-B, who brought up the matter for ission during the Tuesday nooning as the picked of the mine—the ones trusted to pioneer the in that dangerous part of it—sat about on a-blown rock and coal, eating or drinking from buckets: a safety lamp in the cap of each gave for the meal:

Doubts not the young dominee meant no har-," he gave them; "by happing to go to the ager laddie first."

Well," and Jack O'Neil bit through two thick of bread with a stratum of hard corned-beef een as easily as a maid might shear through a olate-cream with her dainty teeth, "he got it me—right atween th' eyes. I told him."

Ya! Ya!" Big Mike fleered; "Yacky, he tole 'im e teet' right outa-like."

e smacked his lips over a cold bit of blutwurst.

Yokie, he say th' wort," Maxim echoed.

lexis rumbled in his chest approval, wagged his k-shocked head.

We need a meen'ster," David said, "to marry, sten, preach over our dead. We pay for such-like ices. We've had them before. I had hopes this being grandson of a miner, would be grippit to with hooks of steel. Oh, for a real leader—one oursen! . . ."

hey were silent for a space. Water dripped about n; the acrid after-reek of high-content dynamite te their olfactory nerves with wonted violence. beyond somewhere a pump coughed; afar they ld hear a mule bray as he came out under lights knew it was time for him to turn into the under-nd barn and munch his oats. A faint "sough" of the great hoist cushioning itself on the elastic i-fluids of the sumph after its big drop from light to Stygian gloom.

lexis coughed between bites.

He pointed to Big Mike's lamp, about the gauze of which a veritable ghost of a specter of flame seemed to be, then vanished.

"I see on O'Ne-el's lamp," sputtered Big Mike; "gas, she is gaining."

"We oughtta have that new fan," growled Jack.

Maxim swigged the last of his tea from his bucket-top with its hollow pocket, screwed the cap of it on again, with lips twisted in imitative gesture, as men will when turning a screw home. Then he produced pipe and tobacco. The other's had relaxed, and no one saw the Slovak begin preparations to smoke until he reached out his hand to strike the match on a dry bit of shale.

"No; too gassy, today," Old David said, striking the match aside. It fell between the cracks of the shale.

"All ri', Dave," Maxim yielded, giving due obedience to the gang's leader.

They sat a moment more. Then came, far off down the shaft, the clangor of a gong.

"One o' the clock," Old David said, getting up, "to work again."

They all scrambled to their feet, putting down buckets as they did so. Erect, they noticed that the corposants of gas-menace were more apparent, dimly seen about the safeties' gauzes.

"Too gassy," Big Mike said.

Alexis coughed—spat.

Maxim took a step off his mound of shale. At the first step there was a little "spat" of fire under him—the match-head grinding between two bits of rock crunched by the hob-nails of him.

"Hah!"

It was Old David, reaching for the match-head that flared up in between the stony débris.

He was all but prone—all but successful—in his effort to pinch out the threat of danger, when, from the little hole where the flaring peril glowed, a tiny spurt of blue flame went—to a pocket of rock a few feet away. They saw it with horror, for it told of gas in little pockets at their feet—the deadly, lurking peril they dreaded worst of all.

"'Ware. . . ."

So David as by instinct threw himself behind a pile of "down" stuff. For as he called and cried the flame leaped from that second hole to another—to another—to another. Then, as they cowered, they saw it gutter, from pocket to pocket, to the end of the chamber and then——

The mountain trembled—chaos engulfed them. . . .

There was one stream uncontaminated with sulphur and other mine refuse near Anthraton—Sweetwater Creek, that flowed north of the big hill under which the Consolidated's operations were. It had been polluted with the all-slaying mine-wash in olden days; then the north shaft had been abandoned and the Sweetwater had been left free of the former mixtures of unthinking greed. So the stream had regained its olden sweetness after many floodtimes—and the trout had returned. The Sweetwater, with its solace, often drew Albert Thorndale when his spirit was troubled, for he found that a day with rod and creel on the little river of rejoicing was good medicine for the inner man—and his soul.

So that Tuesday morning, not to fish so much as to be by himself, Thorndale had gone a-fishing. Noon found him opposite the entrance to the old workings, where he had so often, as a lad, watched his grandfather go in to labor. Thorndale, too, had gone in there with his grandfather on Sundays, and the old man had shown him what it meant to be a miner—the hard rocks to break, the perils of falling rock and gas. The outer passages there were familiar to him, and he had no doubt were as he had seen them last; for before his family had moved to New York, after the grandfather's death, that tunnel had been boarded up.

Dropping his creel, Thorndale ate, but with little appetite. Then he stood his rod against a friendly pine and went toward the boarded-up tunnel-mouth. Somewhere—far inside—Old David, Big Mike, Jack O'Neil, Maxim, Alexis, were at work, enclosed in rock not more adamant than the reserve that all the past months had kept him from their hearts.

He heard voices. Two flaxen-haired, blue-eyed, ragged lads came shyly toward him. When they saw who it was they began to draw back.

"Even the children are distant to me," he said, recognizing them for the children of Big Mike and blonde Mineska, his big-framed mate.

The boys began to pick wintergreens, their eyes aslant at the pastor. His heart yearned for them, yet something kept him from saying the needed word.

"Yes," he thought, "the men are right; I am a coal-miner's grandson, but I have been educated out of touch with them. If I were of them, or could get in some way close to them . . ."

"B-o-o-o-o-mmmmm!"

The mountain before him trembled. With a warning "swish!" dust spurted through the chinks in the old boarding across the tunnel-mouth. And then, with the coal-miner instinct surging up in him, he swirled aside. . . .

In time!

The tunnel-mouth vomited the boards that had closed it so long—vomited, too, dust, rocks, timbering.

The blast of it all but stunned him, yet he had received but the side-swipe of its malignity. He sprang up, alert, intent, his ear cocked toward the gaping hole through which the death-spout had emerged, to spend itself under the shimmer of the noon-hour sunshine.

"It's a blast," the oldest of the tow-headed boys cried.

"Go tell them," Pastor Thorndale called, "that I have gone in here. Get a rescue party here. I'm going in after my boys."

"Yes!" and he seized his young charge by the hand and sped, with the coal-town lad's ready acceptance of the situation, to carry the word.

"What d'you find forwart?" Old David demanded as Big Mike crept out of the gloom that covered everything toward the main workings. Three hours had passed, as they knew from the radio-painted face of Maxim's watch. They were all alive. Some were hurt, but they had stanched the blood with rude bandages. Alexis had a broken leg; Jack O'Neil a smashed hand that he was hiding from them so they would not try to keep him from anything helpful that needed to be done.

"No good!" Mike grunted; "all stuffed mit rocks. Water she come f'um out dhayre."

He sat down, coughed, spat.

"I t'ought so," Jack said, secretly favoring his injured member aside to get it away from Mike's body as the other lopped down beside him and went prone from exhaustion; "we best keep down, close to the bottom, where the air's better."

The oncoming water gurgled under their feet. From some new-cut vein it had begun to flow not long before. Already it was to their ankles when they stood off the débris, on the chamber's floor.

"No hope in front and choked-up timbering behind leading to th' old north tunnel," Old David said, mournfully; "we've heaved on those timbers our best, but they do not budge. And we can't cut them in time."

"Try dynamite, blow them out. We can hide under a rockpile to escape the shock of the explosion," Jack suggested eagerly.

"And have the blast set off the gas in here. Ugh! We've not dared to have a light since the blow-out. It ripped our safety-lamp gauzes to bits."

They sat a while, silent. The water gurgled.

"Half-way to my knee," Jack said.

Maxim lurched in the dark toward where they knew the timbering to the old tunnel was.

"Smoake I smell," he cried. "She burns beyond those timberings."

Old David leaped to the timbering, despite the dark. They heard him breathe deeply as he sniffed the tainted air.

"God help us!" he groaned.

"What ist?" from the Slovene.

"Fire! The blast must have struck sparks out beyond and set the timbering on fire. The water is coming up under us; the passage in front is barred with rock; the gas-cloud gathers thickly at the roof and behind us the fire is raging. When it burns through those timbers . . ."

"God be good to Molly—and the childer," from Jack O'Neil.

Then, except for the crackle of the distant but nearing flames, the gurgle and drip of the water, the settling of the newly crushed rocks on all sides as the internal pressure of the mountain's depths ferreted out the weaknesses of the fresh-fractured débris, all was still.

* * *

Barksdale and his rescue crews battered away at the side of the big cave-in farthest from the old north tunnel. They felt that it could be penetrated there. Big Mike's little son, at the pit-mouth, wailed in vain:—

"Go to the old tunnel; the minister's gone in there. He wanted me to tell."

But he did not know where to go or whom to go to. He ran about so for a long time, until he stumbled, exhausted, against the legs of Edwards, shaft boss of the main mine. The Welsh leader of men took notice, not so much of what the lad was saying, but of his desperate efforts to make people listen. Then, in a few short phrases, he drew from the lad what he knew and called for some of the older miners.

"Try it from there," counseled Cornish Jock; "the old tunnel leads in fair half-way toward where they are in 8-B. We should have thought of it before this."

Within five minutes the rescuers, followed by the women and children and all the rest of Anthraton, were streaming along the mountain side toward the entrance to the old north tunnel and the Sweetwater.

Stumbling forward, Thorndale left the tunnel-mouth over farther behind. When the light from the gaping entrance failed him he fumbled for his electric flasher he always carried on his fishing trips, against a possible return across barbed-wired fields after dark, when he needed its rays to protect his boots. The boots soon shredded on the sharp rocks; then the heavy socks, then his feet began to bleed. He heeded it not.

Up the main tunnel he went, ransacking his memory for fag-ends of all but forgotten mine-lore. He boldly followed the bore until it "pinched" down; then took a side passage. He still was on familiar ground.

Once he fell over some "down" bell-rock; twice he slipped into sink-holes filled with stagnant, scum-coated water. His boots filled, but he disregarded their weight, thinking only of speed, speed, speed. He kept the flasher's contacts together too long, however, for he found it growing dim. Then he realized that he must husband it, and so he left it turned off, except when he actually needed it; pawing, threshing his way forward between flashes as best he could.

And as he went he got the reek of gas, of smoke. This last rejoiced him, as he thought it was coming from the direction in which the men were, for there, if anywhere, would a fire start, he reasoned.

Afar he saw a glimmer of light, as of a flame-flicker. Then it vanished. He came to a wide pool of water and had to swim it and all but sank as the boots dragged him down. Only the stamina that came to him from working ancestors, from his college athletics, kept him alive during that five minutes of stress. He emerged on the other side of the slough to fall inert for a time, too exhausted to go farther then. . . . .

The darkness about him vanished. He was in a full glare of light that came from a side-chamber. He staggered to his feet and saw that a mass of twisted and splintered timbers there was aflame.

He had enough mine knowledge to know that the burning timbers had been smashed, ahead of the blast, from some other working—were perhaps part of a bulkhead and side-timbering appertaining to it. From it projected a huge beam, whose already blazing end, buried in the mass near its bottom, and whose other end, sticking out toward him, lever-like, seemed like a veritable Archimedean machine for raising mountains—given the power applied to its immense bole, with the mass of rock that snubbed it down among its blazing fellows as the fulcrum.

Thorndale gazed at the flaming barrier that held him back. He dashed toward it—heard voices on the other side.

"Who is there?" he called.

Silence. The flames crackled.

Then he heard a feeble call.

The voice was that of Old David:

"Wha's thare?"

"'Tis I, Thorndale."

"Are ye alone?" he heard Jack O'Neil.

"Yes; I've sent a lad for help—long ago. Will they ever come!"

The flames roared up. Thorndale had to fall back. He estimated his chance of dampening them with water carried in his hat and saw it was useless.

"What c'n you do?" Old David called; "have you a tool or anything?"

"No. . . ."

Then he saw the big beam. Like lightning his brain cleared of the fog of exhaustion. He forgot his bleeding feet, his hands torn on the rocks, his head, battered from like causes. He noted the deep bite the end of the beam had in the base of the blazing stuff, the terrific leverage its length, so snubbed-down, gave one who could press down on the free end.

"Wait; stand back from the burning timbers!" he called.

He steeled himself for the effort, leaped, caught the end of the lever-like beam. His weight brought it down. . . .

"It lifts!" he called; "I've got a lever in the bottom of the pile; I can tear it down," he finished; "or open a way somehow."

The timber swayed to one side, and before he knew it his back was almost against the nearest of the burning stuff that came near to where the timber ended on that one side of the chamber-wall. He swayed it back again to get away from the flames, and the motion lost him what he had gained.

"Wait!" he screamed; "I'm not able now. Watch for the hole at the pile's bottom and break through if you can."

"Ye may fire th' gas in here, but we must reesk it," Jack called; "'tis our last chance."

Again he essayed the awful effort. Again the timber, as he drew it to that certain point and as he saw the hole appear beneath the blazing pile, swayed with him. Some inequality in it or the rock on which it was snubbed, threw it off-center when he got it down within saving distance of the floor of the chamber.

Again he had to yield, not to the fire, for he was willing to be burned alive if he could save them, but to the sane reasoning that if he tried to save them and failed, because of being overcome by the flames, just as one of them was forcing his way from under the flaming doorway of fate, he would slay, instead of saving, his people.

His back was so hot that he thought its coverings of clothing were afire, so he threw himself into the big pool again and came out, drenched.

"This time, with the water to keep my clothing from catching, with God's help, I will stand the gaff."

His mind—his mental voice—had snapped back to old days and the old slang word slipped out. Yes, he would stand the gaff!

He staggered forward, drew the end of the flaming timber down. The flames were running along it now, toward his steaming hands. The air in the chamber was fairly crackling with heat. The sparks snapped over him; little eddies of flames caressed him with awful stigmata of evil.

"Are you still there?" he called.

"Aye!" from Old David. "What shall we do?"

"When I lift, do you come out. Do you hear me."

"Yes," from several.

"I shall be bent over my lever—I can not see you pass. Call to me, so I shall know when you are out. And do not heed if my back seems to burn. It will be steam—my clothing is cool,—soaked in water. Do you understand?"

"Aye, lad, lift away. Now!"

He bore down! The beam, raising the fiery stuff, made the hole appear again. The huge timber came to its usual position, then began to sway him over against the flaming débris behind him. Schooled in its malign tricks, Pastor Thorndale felt for the chamber floor with his toes, got a purchase and stopped it!

"Come!" he called.

His arms outstretched, he pressed his strong chest onto the lever. His muscles cracked with the effort. He could feel the stab of the heat through the soaked clothing on his back—could feel his shirt, under his outing coat, begin to crinkle.

His eye, glued to the hole, started to see Alexis, the injured, thrust through by Old David.

"Creep for it, boy!" the gang leader called.

"Who comes?" Pastor Thorndale called.

"Alexis!"

"Now, Jock," and O'Neil staggered out, fighting the flames on his clothing.

"Big Mike!" Old David called, and the Slovene sped by the flaming walls and the minister at his post of fearful peril.

"Maxim!" and the Slovak bolted out.

"Hurry, now lads," and Old David hustled the others.

The old man came last, as became his post of leader. He won through swiftly and plucked at the groaning parson as he passed. The minister called:

"Are you all safe, my people?"

"All out!" and Old David, shielding his face with his hand, turned to plunge forward, thinking other would come, too.

A smother of flames and smoke came as the k beam, released of Thorndale's control, swung up and the hole through which they had come closed, like an eye of hell winking shut.

Thorndale was prone! But David turned aga and saw!

"Ho, Mike! Come for the dominee. . . ."

Big Mike turned in mid-stride and came b Together the old Welsher, last of the old era of mi in the hard coal regions, and Big Mike, of the era of alien brawn, gathered up the smoking mass began to carry the minister toward the tunnel-mo As they waded the big pool, across which the ot already were, he stirred in their arms and begge be set down.

"My back it is," he stormed at them; "it is bu a bit or steamed, where the heat drove the st through the cloth into the skin. Otherwise I am right, but faint."

They set him down. An arm about Old Dav shoulder, another about Big Mike's, he staggered toward daylight, safety.

Led by Big Mike's boy and Edwards, the resc stormed toward the entrance to the north tun Their foreguard gathered about it, ready to en when they heard voices coming out. A shout w up, telling all what was to be expected. Into cleared space the crowd's leaders forced the pe to make before the entrance to the bore; prese emerged the trio: Old David, Big Mike, Par Thorndale, and behind them the others from 8 Cheer after cheer went up.

Thorndale swayed erect. His clothing, in tatt from fire and rocks, was a mass of grime and sli

"Give me the touch of your shoulder, boys," called, and his friends thronged him, upheld him

Their clothing, too, was shredded; their fa scored with fire and grimed with soot.

Blood streamed from Parson Thorndale's f head; his hands, peeling with blisters, hung at limp at his sides.

A hush fell over the people.

"Are all the 8-B men here?" Edwards called

"All, thanks to the dominee," Old David cri "he brought us from the mouth of hell. We ha him to thank for our lives."

There were no cheers, no glad cries. There w just a rustle, passing over the silent people as th faced the knot of the redeemed men standing th with Thorndale in their midst. It was Jack O'N still hiding his smashed hand from them all, w called the needed word:

"Will our pastor please give thanks?"

Thorndale's hand went up. The heads bow The rustling sound as of people bending their backs supplicatory pose was heard, then the words ca that brought healing to the people.

As, upheld by the friends who loved him, Thornda went down the mountainside toward the little tow they sang, full-throated, happy:

A Woman's Appreciation of Lincoln

Mrs. Jane M. Johns

By REV. FRANK HAMPTON FOX

MRS. JANE M. JOHNS, of Decatur, Ill., though in her ninety-third year, has taken a keen interest and an energetic part in all of the home activities connected with this fourth war through which she has passed. She speaks as few women can concerning war; for she enjoys the unique experience of having seen seventeen members of her family enlist in the Civil War. Her grandson, a captain in the United States Navy, was cited for distinguished service in foreign waters last summer.

"I knew Mr. Lincoln better than those who have written volumes about him," she said recently, "because I knew him before he became famous. I met him first in Decatur in December, 1849. Dr. Johns and I had rooms in the Macon House; my piano, after a long journey by steamer down the Ohio and up the Wabash to Crawfordsville, and from there to Decatur by wagon, arrived at the hotel late in the afternoon. The question of unloading the instrument perplexed us; for there was no man in sight except the landlord.

"'Wait,' he said, 'until court adjourns.' The men came soon, and the landlord explained, 'There's a piano in that box, and this woman wants some one to help unload it. Who'll lend a hand?'

"A tall gentleman with a large shawl folded lengthwise, scarf-fashion, over his shoulders and caught together under his chin with an immense safety pin, stepped forward, saying, 'Come on, Sweet, you're the next biggest man.'

"That was my first meeting with Abraham Lincoln. The piano was quickly unloaded. After dinner Mr. Lincoln supervised the setting up of the instrument. He received my thanks with a polite bow, and asked, 'May we have a tune before we go?'

"After the night session of the court adjourned, we had an impromptu concert in which several of the guests at the hotel participated. Finally, I sang, 'He doeth all things well,' and Mr. Lincoln said, 'Don't let us spoil that song by any other music to-night.'

"On one occasion, when Mr. Lincoln was a guest in my home, I asked him why he determined to quit politics after his term in Congress. He answered, 'I was only poor white trash in the eyes of the leaders, who had so organized their forces that I was powerless.'

"Eight years later, the Kansas-Nebraska question sent him back into politics as a moral obligation. After being twice defeated for the United States Senate, he accepted the verdict as final. Providence, however, reserved Mr. Lincoln for a greater destiny. During the political campaign of 1854, Mr. Lincoln was a frequent visitor in our home. Through these conferences which he held with my husband and other leaders, I came to know Mr. Lincoln well and to love him as a high-minded moral leader of men. never permitted his personal interests or those his party to stand in the way of the general goo In discussing individuals he was sympathetic an just—placing himself in the position of the perso judged.

"Though I heard Mr. Lincoln speak on the politic questions of the day, nothing that he said made lasting impression on my mind. After a big politic rally, Owen Lovejoy, 'Long John' Wentworth an Mr. Lincoln were our guests for dinners. While th other men discussed the news of the day, Mr. Lincol took my little Fanny on his knee and put an arm around Corwin and told them stories for half an hou That incident made a deeper impression on my min than any political speech I ever heard. He neve passed a child without a smile and a touch tha seemed a benediction.

"I have read descriptons of Mr. Lincoln whic characterized him as a rough backwoodsman, whom everybody addressed familiarly as 'Abe.' In his political addresses, he probably adapted himself t the methods of thought acceptable to the men wh heard him. In the homes, there was none of that for Mr. Lincoln was a gentleman of the old school He always arose when a woman entered the room and remained standing so long as she did. His courtly manners would put to shame the easy-going indiffe ence to etiquette which characterizes many men to day. I never knew a man who on all occasions showe such unfailing courtesy to women and such gentl affection for children as Abraham Lincoln."

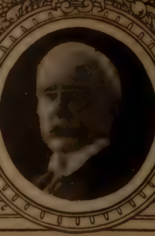
THE SILENCE OF JESUS



A SERMON

By

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—Luke 23 : 9. "He answered him nothing."

LET us walk for a little while with Jesus and his disciples. They are passing out of Galilee, their own native Galilee, into an alien country, into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. Now you know the feelings of repugnance which the Jews entertained toward every other race. They regarded them as unspeakably inferior. If a man wasn't a Jew he was a beast! Imagine, then, the disciples crossing the borderland into the territory of one of these alien peoples. Immediately their national pride asserted itself. Their feelings of exclusiveness were excited, feelings of superiority and aloofness. Their whole manner was made to proclaim "no relationship." As they walk along the road they occasionally pass groups of these people, and the disciples mutter to one another in terms of disdain. The Master is a little in advance, but he turns his head to listen to their conversation, and he hears them complacently agreeing among themselves that the people of this country are no better than dogs. "Dogs! Unclean dogs!" He says nothing, but the word and the contempt that inspired it go to his heart like cold steel.

And behold, one of the women of this despised people came toward them, and as she approached the disciples said one to another, "Here comes one of the dogs." She was in great distress, and somehow or other she had heard a rumor about the wondrous Galilean who had come into their midst. And she came near to the Master, and fell at his feet with as touching and pathetic a cry as ever smote his tender heart. It is just the cry to unseal the fountains of his purity, and he will drench her wounded spirit with benediction, and send her home with a most gracious response. "Have mercy upon me, O Lord: my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil." . . . "But he answered her not a word."

THE silence of Jesus! How mysterious! How unsympathetic! We thought he would have treated her as if she had been his own mother! We thought there would have been a welcome full of the hospitality of heaven! But he takes no notice of her. He stands before her in a silence that is most chilling. Surely there is a purpose in all this. Let us look for it. The feelings of the disciples seemed to be seconded in the attitude of the Master. They had looked upon her approach with feelings of contempt; and now the silence of the Master only intensified their feelings, and they cried out, "Send her away, send her away!" Then the Lord looks down upon the poor woman who is kneeling at his feet, looks at her so tenderly, and, pointing to the disciples, he says to her, "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

Then, are these proud, hard-hearted, unsympathetic men samples of the people who alone are to have the glorious privilege of his healing and saving power? I am beginning to suspect the meaning of the Master's strange conduct toward this sorrowful woman. He is going to make use of this woman to teach a grand and much-needed lesson to these twelve men. "I am not sent but to the house of Israel." Then the woman, with tears streaming down her cheeks, and with hands locked as though in prayer, lifted her face toward the Master, and cried with the agony of her heart, "Lord, help me!" And Jesus answered and said: "It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to the—dogs." And before he said that word "dogs," I think he slightly paused, and looked at the disciples, and then said it; and his looks and the tone and the word recalled that conversation they had in the way, and which they thought their Master had never heard, and they now began to feel that the Master was calling them up for judgment. "It is not meet to take the children's bread," and these stony-hearted, selfish men were the children; "and to give it to the dogs"—and this kneeling, weeping, broken-hearted, unselfish woman was one of the dogs! The ironical contrast made the disciples begin to hang their heads in shame.

"Yes," the Master seemed to say, "this is what you claimed as you came along in the way—you are 'the children,' the beloved children, and this woman is a type of the dog, the despised dog." There are some compliments that make us blush with shame. There are some proffered honors that only humiliate us. And when these disciples heard their Master call them the children of the Kingdom, and then take their own word and call this woman a dog, they felt the irony of the compliment, and were filled with discomfort. But, all unknown to herself, the woman went on to deepen their confusion. She laid hold of that word "dog," that word which the disciples had so gladly dropped out of the conversation, and she said:

"Yea, Lord, a dog; I am willing to be regarded as a dog; but even the dogs are allowed to have the crumbs which fall from their master's table. I don't ask for the bread. Give that to thy children, to thy good disciples here, but when the children have been fed, Lord, spare one crumb of thy power, one crumb of thy love, one crumb of thy helpfulness for a poor old dog!"

By that time the disciples had come to feel that they were the dogs, and that was the purpose the Master had been pursuing. He had determined, as they came along the way, when he heard them use the contemptuous word, that he would drive their sword into their own souls. And now, as one by one they turned away from the woman in shame, and some of them with eyes filled with tears, he saw that his purpose was accomplished, and that great heart of his, that had been almost bursting to declare its affection for the woman, broke out in a torrent of love.

"Oh, woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt."

He would have given that reply at first, only he wanted, by his reply, not only to heal her daughter, but to humiliate twelve men. By his apparent harshness to one woman he blessed the souls of twelve men. The apparent silence of his love was really working the will of a larger love. By that mysterious silence which followed the woman's appeal, the Master glorified his name.

NOW, does not that incident give us a key by which we may interpret some of the silence of Jesus today? Sometimes we kneel at his feet, and pray, and ask for mercies, and the Lord is very silent and seems to answer us never a word. He may be giving us a greater answer than we asked.

Your little lad was ill, and nigh unto death, and you cried out in prayer, "Lord, have mercy upon me, and save him!" And God seemed so silent, and seemed to answer you never a word. Ah, but you don't know how many others God is going to bless by his apparent silence to you. There are others living around you who, maybe, have not got a dead child, but they have got something worse, they have got dead hearts; and God wants to get at those dead hearts, and by his apparent silence to you he is going to raise them from the dead. Your lad may die that others may be born again. Your wife may die that others may be born again. Your husband may die that others may be born again. The faith of this woman, in the face of the apparent hardness of Christ, melted the hearts of twelve men.

And has not that happened again and again? A great trouble comes upon a man, the very blackness of night descends upon him, and he prays the Lord to lift it, and the Lord seems so silent and gives no answer. But the man maintains his faith, maintains his hopefulness, maintains his love, and his fellow men look at him in wonder and admiration, and one says to another, "To look at him makes me feel ashamed of myself!" Shamed out of fretfulness, shamed out of selfishness, shamed out of sin!

Let us think of this when sometimes we are bewildered with the silence of Jesus. Let us think that there are others concerned, just as there were twelve disciples concerned in the answer to prayer of this woman; and let us pray that, come what will, if silence seem to be the answer to our particular prayer, it may be answered in blessedness to others.

Let us now pass away from the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, and gather in Jerusalem, in the palace of the high priest. The gray light of the dawn is just beginning to stream through the windows as the high priest takes his place, and the Man of Nazareth is brought forward to hear the accusation made against him. One is glad that at last Jesus is brought face to face with a man holding so high and sacred an office. He will now be questioned fairly, and have an opportunity of triumphantly refuting the baseless charges brought against him by his foes. This examination will surely end the matter.

Let us read: "Then the high priest arose questioned him. . . . But Jesus held his pea The silence of Jesus! How strange! The ques seemed a perfectly fair one. Why was Jesus sil Because he knew there was no use in giving an ans But why? Because the high priest's mind was n up. His judgment was ready before the case opened. He had prejudged the case, and his deci was already made. Now Jesus Christ is alw silent before the inquiry of a man who has alre made up his mind. Jesus Christ never answ prejudgment; he makes no reply to prejudice. stands before it silent as a stone!

THERE is such a thing as an open mind. very phrase, "an open mind," is a popular familiar term among us. Just mark the phra an open mind, almost suggesting the figure of flower which opens its gates to the first faint ray light that comes with the early dawn, and keeps th open for the last belated ray which comes at close of the day as long as there is light abo having an open house! An open mind! Greedily coming every ray of light, all wise counsel, all reve tion.

And there is such a thing as a closed mind, w every chink and aperture sealed, rejecting all su gestions, spurning all revelation, refusing all lig You may batter it with counsels, the door will not opened. Well, now, even we ourselves refrain fr giving counsel to a man whose mind is made up a closed, and this not because we are unwilling to it, but because it is no use.

It is not otherwise with God. He demands open mind, or he will not counsel us and answer o requests. He will not answer a prayer that is put a matter of form; it must come as an expression mental and spiritual thirst. He asks for an ope mind and an open heart. "Open thy mouth wid and I will fill it"; I will fill thy mind and heart wit gracious revelation and most nutritious truth. Bu God himself cannot feed a man whose mouth is shu God himself cannot enlighten a man whose mind closed. And he will not try! He will not cast h pearls before swine, which simply means that will not give his counsels to men who will despi them, and trample upon them, because their de cisions and purposes are already made.

This was the case with the high priest. He ask questions to which he had provided his own answer and by which he meant to abide, and so Jesus mad no reply to the questions. He was silent befor him. "He held his peace."

NOW, let us bring this matter very near hom Jesus Christ may preserve a similar silen toward many of us. Have we ever drawn near t God with our minds made up, and yet asked him t give us light? Have we ever asked for light with closed mind? Have we ever asked God to give counsel as to what we ought to do, and yet before prayed we had quite decided as to what we would d Before such a prayer God would hold his peac A man makes up his mind that a certain matter business is perfectly right, and then with his made- mind he goes to ask for the guidance of God. will get no answer, and the infinite peril is this: th he does not know that he gets no answer, and com to regard his own premature judgment as the expres sion of the mind of God.

That is how we are deceived. We make up ou minds, and then we pray, and we think we hear th voice of God, and we are only hearing echoes of ou own. The great God is silent! "Be still, an know that I am God." Be still! Silence the voi of your own will. Put your own clamoring desire the rear. Be still! Pray! Listen! And you wi hear "the still small voice."

"Ship by Truck"

—the traffic motto of today and the future

By Harvey S. Firestone
President, Firestone Tire & Rubber Co.

THE necessities of war brought home to us the importance of the motor truck. When the French line stood at the Marne, the truck began to receive the recognition it deserved.

War, in that emergency, taught us overnight an industrial lesson that we would otherwise have taken years to learn. People realized, all at once, that the motor truck was essential and vital in our transportation, and therefore a basic part of our living.

Like good roads, motor trucking should interest every man, woman or child. Both are basic elements in lowering the cost of distribution, saving products now wasted, opening up resources heretofore untapped.

The truck is ready and able to shoulder burdens the railroads cannot carry and to leave them free for responsibilities too long deferred and delayed.

It is a time for principals to confer—a time for them to co-operate. The traffic situation is one of greatest significance. Our future industrial growth depends largely upon the assistance rendered the railroads by trucks in speeding up freight movement. Communities which are not served by the railroads find in the truck the means for their rapid development.

"Ship by Truck."

Let us make this the slogan of a new business era.

Truck lines already stream out from city to city, from distributing centers to the surrounding towns, hamlets and rural districts. Use the truck arteries. You'll serve yourself and the public. You'll relieve the railroads of a part of the overwhelming demands now being made upon them.

The truck is the one satisfactory solution to the difficulties of short-haul freight. The hundred-mile radius belongs to the truck. But the truck has not stopped there. Its future is restricted only by the extent of good roads and systematic schedules.

"Ship by Truck."

You'll save and serve. Pass the word on to your traffic department. Take it up with your business associates. Speak of it to others in your industry.

Whether it's your truck or one belonging to a truck transport company—

"Ship by Truck."

Speed traffic; aid the railroads to give the country a freighting system that can cope with the rapid growth of industry. Get in line with the future trend of transportation.

"Ship by Truck."

Sentimentalism

SUNDAY, February 9. Luke 9 : 57. "I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest." Surely that was the speech of a sentimentalist! I think of sentimentalism as ill-formed sentiment. Noble sentiment is deep feeling wedded to lofty thinking. When the feeling is separated from the thinking, sentiment degenerates into sentimentalism. It then becomes a very precarious thing. It endureth but for a little while and passes away like a transient shower which has scarcely moistened the ground.

Now our Lord never allowed anything that seemed like sentimentalism to pass unchallenged. He called it to halt while He questioned its worth. He tested all light words, all apparently light words, as a tradesman tests suspicious coins upon the counter. Do they ring true, or is their response a dull leaden thing like unto death? This man's impulse was tested when the Lord sharply turned his eyes away from the light furnishings of a picnic to the heavy desolations of a perilous and lonely road. "And Jesus said, foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head."

And the inference of the Saviour's words is this—"Thy sentiment is sufficient for the quiet meadows. How will it fare on the field of battle? Thou art equipped for ways of comfort. How wilt thou fare in the midst of homelessness? Can thy sentiment endure the chilling midnight, or will it fail when the first cold shadow falls upon it?" That was the Master's test. And I have often wondered if this man still followed Jesus in the way. Was he found in Gethsemane and near the cross? Or did he turn back and walk no more with Him? And therefore may we not say that the smell of the fire tries every man's work, every man's sentiment, of what sort it is. J. H. J.

Our Own Place

MONDAY, February 10. Acts 1 : 25. "From which Judas by transgression fell, that he might go to his own place." Each of us has his own place in the economy of life. But, because this life is probationary, and because we are gifted with free will, we are at liberty to decline to occupy our place. It is different, however, in the world to come. Probation being ended, each of us goes inevitably and irrevocably to his own place. And each of us has his own place in the eternal world. We make our places by the character of our lives here. Our eternal places are portable—we carry them with us through this world. This is only another way of saying that character determines destiny, and we all know that we are daily building character. Profoundly true is the gospel of consequences. Henry Van Dyke's story of "The Mansion" is a forceful illustration of this truth. A man of large wealth, professedly religious, died, and looked through all the streets of the New Jerusalem for the mansion he was convinced was to be his dwelling-place. He found it at last, but it was not a mansion; it was a small, undecorated hut. The angel said, "It was the best we could build for you with the material you sent ahead." This man went to his own place.

Heaven is "a prepared place for a prepared people." Now is the period of our preparation. The gift of God to be coveted is not the saint's inheritance, but fitness for the saint's inheritance. C. C. A.

Rebuke to the Pharisee

TUESDAY, February 11. Luke 11 : 39, 40. "Now do ye Pharisees make clean the outside of the cup and the platter; but your inward part is full of ravening and wickedness. Ye fools, did not he that made that which is without make that which is within also?" These words of our Lord were spoken at the beginning of a breakfast to which he had been invited at the house of a Pharisee. The Lord's remark is not an uncalled-for invective hurled at his host without any provocation. The Pharisee had remarked that the Lord had not washed before sitting down to the table. Jesus had just come in from the street, where the people had crowded about him to listen to his discourse. He was probably weary and in a hurry to proceed to other work. The host had observed his omission and had expressed his surprise. That was rude, and if there was any breach of decorum in this episode, the host, not the guest, must be charged with it. He had neither been hospitable nor benevolent. Since he had made a point in his punctilious sanctity a matter of religion, he fairly challenged the Lord to declare himself on a fundamental principle of true religion, which is this, that external actions derive their worth or unworth from the character of the doer. A corrupt heart spoils the most saintly performance, while a pure heart hallows any unconventionality. The Lord invites his host to examine whether his inward life was as clean and decorous as he wished to appear in his outward actions; also whether he was really as scrupulous about the fundamentals of religion as he showed himself to be about trivial expressions of religion. The Lord's remarks were not only pertinent and timely but very necessary. He must vindicate himself and expose the hypocrisy of his censorious host. He would have been a menial sycophant and not an honest guest if he had passed over the criticism of his host in silence.

"Come and Dine"

WEDNESDAY, February 12. John 21 : 5, 12. "Then Jesus said unto them, Children, have ye any meat? They answered, No. Jesus saith unto them, Come and dine." Our Lord did not need the great draft of fishes they had caught, by casting the net on the right side of the ship; he had bread and fish already on the fire. Where the faithful toiler is, Christ is always present. He is One among the lowly, ready to feed the hungry. After the meal is over, he has meat to give them they know not of. He says, "I am the living bread of life; he that eateth of me shall live by me. He that drinketh of the water I shall give him, shall never thirst. Therefore, partake until the soul is fully satisfied." Christ's peace is medicine to lessen pain; his love, food for the famished. He commissions his disciples to go forth and invite the world to come and dine, saying, "Go out into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in to my supper." Bread may run short in famine and war, but he has an inexhaustible supply. He can feed thousands as well as one. The upper room, the Transfiguration Mount and the seaside were eating-places for all the people who followed him. When he breaks the bread, every place is a sacrament, every scene of fellowship is a Holy Communion supper with him. Bodily food is an emblem of the spiritual manna which comes down from heaven. He helps in business life as well as in soul prosperity. He tells where to cast the net for a multitude of fishes or for a lost world. Ask him, the great Guide; he knows the way, the how, when and where. Obey his command, launch out in the deep waters of his love, you who are standing on the shore fearful of the waves. He will not suffer you to sink down; his hand holds, his fullness fills. Come and dine with the King of kings, the Lord of glory; his table is full and free and forever waiting your coming.

Things That Accompany Salvation

THURSDAY, February 13. Heb. 6 : 9. "But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation." Salvation is the great idea and word of our religion, representing its ultimate object. It is not disparaging to our faith to say that a single word represents its central idea. This is true of other religions. The religion of Greece mag fied beauty; that of Rome, law; that of Persia, lig Jesus' great word is salvation. Salvation means mu more than mere safety. The implications of the w are infinite. There are qualities which properly bel to Christian character, qualities which are the fruit Christian culture. First among these is absolute l alty to truth. No man has any right to call hims a Christian who regards truth as anything less th indispensable. Loyalty to faith is another such companiment of salvation, by which is meant, not faith alone, but faith, as involving one's pledged wo Business confidence rests on faith. So does friendsh Christianity, in its simplest statement, is friends with God through Jesus Christ. This involves o faith in God, and God's faith in us. God is under t same necessity that we are under, to be loyal to fai as well as to truth.

A judge once said to a physician who had neglect to protect the body of a patient, "The body of yo patient should have been as sacred to you as the ve body of your Saviour." Humanity is sacred in t eyes of Christ, and he meant it should be in ours well. These are the first three marks of Christi culture. Do we meet the test? Does our nation me the test? It is easy to curse the Kaiser, but it is n so easy to apply these standards to ourselves. W must do it, however, for only so do we serve the cau for which we fight, and only so do we serve him wh "is sifting out the hearts of men before his judgmen seat." C. C. A.

GIVING

A SONG my heart has been singing,
  Has been singing the whole day thru:
"Give to the world the best you have,
  And the best will come back to you."

Give with no thought of receiving,
  Save joy that the giver knows;
Joy at soothing a sorrow,
  Or sharing another's woes.

Full oft a wee bit of lifting
  Does much to lighten the load;
And a step by the side is like magic,
  In smoothing the rugged road.

Somewhere along life's pathway
  Each kind act has its mate,
Some turn of the road you'll find it,
  Some time, be it soon or late.

But should it hide in the shadow,
  The best of the best will be,
To have the Saviour whisper,
  "You did it unto me."

Giving Alms

FRIDAY, February 14. Luke 11 : 41. "But rath give alms of such things as ye have; and, behold, a things are clean unto you." It is a question with the i terpreters of this text whether the Lord spoke the words ironically, from the viewpoint of the Pharisee or whether he meant to lay down a moral rule. Th former interpretation has been inspired by one of th basic teachings of Christianity, viz., that no man ca become pure in the sight of God by his own work According to this first view the trend of the Lord' remark would be this: "You Pharisees have a nic easy way of squaring yourself with the law of holines whenever you have been at fault in anything yo quickly give a few pennies to the poor and then yo imagine you have fully rehabilitated yourself wit your Judge." But while this interpretation woul harmonize well with the preceding defense of the Lord it does not do full justice to the present text. Th Lord plainly speaks in the imperative mood: "Giv alms." This is, moreover, a commandment which th Scriptures issue in many places. God desires tha mercy shall become one of the standard expression of our religious mind. But the mercies which we show to the needy, our charities, are not to be connecte with our righteousness in the sight of God; they ar not to be made the basis of a compensation which w expect from God; they give us no claim for reward for if they are rightly performed the question of rewar does not enter into our truly charitable actions What the Lord means to say is this: Higher than any prescribed ceremonial is the great principle of love t our fellowmen. How Jesus Speaks

SATURDAY, February 15. John 7 : 46. "Never man spake like this man." He who is the Truth, the Way and the Life, tells of his own wonderful character when he speaks to men. His words are tested by the impartation of his own nature, the fruits of the tree of life. Faith looks unto him and lives forever. The sinsick and wounded find him a balm in Gilead, a Saviour of the lost. Where he is, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed and the bleeding side is beheld as proof of his resurrection. His ascension is evidence o the many-mansioned home. Pentecost is his spirit, speaking in power to the hearts of men.

For nineteen hundred years, Jesus has spoken in th masterpieces of melody, of sculpture, painting, poetry, literature, and in the events of all history. His voice means peace and final triumph; his kingdom is now approaching noontide splendor. He speaks through millions of his followers who describe the truth which has made them free, who practice his life of ministry, self-denial and benevolence, finding greatest joy in living and doing for fellow men.

His word and example are that helpfulness is true greatness; brotherhood, real Christianity; sympathy and fellowship for men, holy religion. These qualities are like him, who is love itself.

Jesus speaks through reforms, pulpits and press; in the words of prohibition of drunkenness, slavery, lust and war. Our Lord's words are not mere theories or theologies, but real life, eternal life. E. W. C.

World-Wide Church Unity Now Urged!

An Interchurch World Movement Discussed by Two Notable Conferences

By H. K. CARROLL, LL.D.

IF THE work of saving the world for Christianity and Democracy cannot be done by all the denominations working separately, they must together to do it. It is unthinkable that forces of righteousness would refuse to this, for it must be accomplished at atever sacrifice!"

This is, in substance, the summons ich moved the Foreign Missions Con- ence at New Haven, January 14–17, unanimous vote to approve of a ited campaign by the churches for the rk represented by the Home and reign Missionary Societies, the Coun- of Sunday Schools and the Council of Church Boards of Education. Such combination as this could not have n imagined five years ago. The con- ions created by the war have forced on the denominations questions as at in their way as those imposed on the Allies. As the victorious les faced their responsibilities with urage and determination, the churches not do less with the problems of the rld's redemption before them. Chris- nity suffered no defeat in the war; it ist not think of surrender, now that war is over.

If it be asked: Why is the situation re urgent than it was before the war? e answer is, because the war throws ew, revealing light upon it, and shows in its true proportions. No nation s escaped the influences, good and l, of the struggle that was fought on o continents and which embraced all nations in its effects. The Peace uncil includes delegates from all the e continents. Those who sit at the le where the campaign of the Church all Nations is planned, are even more dely representative of the countries the East and the West, the North d the South, and their reports of con- ions, political, social, and industrial well as religious, are as accurate as y that will be considered at the Ver- lles Conference.

HE Foreign Missions Conference, which held its annual session in w Haven, represented the Boards d Societies of all the Evangelical de- minations in the United States and nada having missions in foreign ds—the Bible Society, the Y. M. and W. C. A., the Student Volunteer ovement, and many others, 178 in all. ey expend upon their work $20,000,- 0 annually. The Home Missions uncil, meeting in New York City nuary 14–17, represented all the angelical denominations doing mis- nary work, on an annual expenditure more than ten million dollars, in the ited States and its possessions. These ganizations together represent a re- ious enterprise wide as the globe, tivities as comprehensive as the needs man, and, in a peculiar sense, the ind and heart, the physical and spiri- l life of the Church of Christ. The stness and importance of the work aws the societies, and through them e churches, ever closer and closer to- ther. And it is these Conferences and uncils which plan and direct, extend d develop (even more than the ec- siastical governing Conferences of e denominations themselves) the re- mptive work of the world.

HE initiative in the movement for a union of the denominations in a mpaign for missionary, Sunday school d educational work in the United ates and the world was taken by Dr. mes I. Vance, Moderator of the uthern Presbyterian General Assem- y, during a meeting in New York, ecember 17, of representatives of a mber of Foreign Mission Boards. He id Christianity had come to the great- hour in its history since Calvary. r had not saved the world; war had placed the world in a condition to be saved. This the Church must do. Can it, will it? If not, the world is bankrupt, society insolvent. The outcome was an endeavor to secure wider cooperation. From a Committee of Twenty has come a plan in outline for an "Interchurch World Movement of North America," which is designed to unite the Evangelical forces in a great campaign of advance. Dr. S. Earl Taylor, secretary of the Methodist Episcopal Foreign Board, is chairman of the Committee of Twenty, and presented its report to the Foreign Missions Conference on Tuesday evening, January 14. He accompanied it with such an array of facts and figures, charts and maps, pictures and descriptions that the hundreds of expert members of the Conference were ready to approve recommendations in principle without a moment of hesitation or a word of discussion. Conditions in the United States, this most Christian land, proved the whole case. Dr. Taylor used for the purpose the results of a thorough survey embracing every district, county and community. Here are some illustrations of conditions, not of over-occupancy, but of no occupancy at all:

1. In Ohio and Illinois there are numberless situations where considerable communities are without adequate church privileges, or with no privileges at all.

2. In one county there are eleven churches and only one pastor. Many other counties have churches without any pastor.

3. In the coke region of Pennsylvania there is a population of 70,000 which is wholly churchless.

4. In Los Angeles the pastor of a small church made an elaborate chart of his parish, which contains 60,000 people, who are rapidly becoming solidly foreign. He found forty-one languages and races close around his church, and among them a hodge-podge of church organizations, some of which he could not identify, each ministering to its own small fraction with no plan of cooperation. The pastor asked for $60,000 to build and equip a "Church of the Nations," and got it. In one section of the city there are thirty-seven nationalities so mixed that it is impossible to classify them.

5. Migration of negroes from the South into Northern cities of 250,000 or more creates conditions which the denominations separately cannot meet. In Philadelphia alone there are 70,000 negroes without church accommodations. There are streams of Mexican migration toward Los Angeles and other centers, which create a whole series of pressing problems.

THESE are only a few of the demonstrations of a spiritual destitution in city, suburb, town, village and settlement which few knew or even suspected.

The plan, as approved in principle by the Foreign Missions Conference, by the Home Missions Council and by the Council of Women for Home Missions, the Federation of Women's Boards of Foreign Missions, the Sunday School Council and Council of Church Boards of Education, provides for a unified program of Christian service by the Protestant Churches of North America, to embrace home and foreign missions, and all other interests which are conducted by denominational or interdenominational agencies. Local church budgets are excepted. A General Committee of a hundred is to decide on questions of policy, and an Executive Committee of fifteen to decide details and to direct the movement, with a separate Council for Canada. State and local organizations of Christian forces and regional conferences will sound the message. A field

The Tooth Wrecker

Has Been Conquered

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

We Know How to End Film

This is not written to ask you to buy something. It is to ask you to test something which dentists have thoroughly tested. And to see what it does for your teeth, at our cost.

You are not keeping teeth clean by old methods. Doubtless you know that. You find that teeth discolor, find that tartar forms. A dental cleaning must occasionally remove it. And millions who brush teeth twice daily do not prevent decay or pyorrhea.

Dental authorities know that the reason lies in a slimy film. It is ever present, ever forming. It clings to the teeth; it gets into crevices, hardens and stays, and resists the tooth brush.

That film causes most tooth troubles. It absorbs stains, and the teeth look discolored. It hardens into tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. Dentists call the film "bacterial plaque." Those germs, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea, and of many other troubles.

Your present methods do not end that film. A new method does combat it in a most efficient way. It is now embodied in a dainty dentifrice called Pepsodent, and we ask you to prove it out.

Prove This At Our Cost

Dental authorities have put Pepsodent to many sorts of clinical tests. Its efficiency is now beyond question. The results are so clear, so conspicuous, that anyone will realize them at once. We urge you to watch them on your own teeth for ten days, then draw your own conclusions.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of pepsin is to dissolve it, then to constantly combat it.

Heretofore this method seemed impossible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual method is an acid, harmful to the teeth. But science has lately found a harmless activating method. Five governments have already granted patents. That method, used in Pepsodent, has revolutionized teeth cleaning. It has conquered our greatest tooth enemy.

Judge this for yourself. Send this coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Use it like any tooth paste. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the slimy film. See how the teeth whiten—how they glisten—as the fixed film disappears.

This test costs you nothing. It will be a revelation. And it may save vast discomfort, both to you and yours.

Cut out the coupon now.

Leading automobile engineers have worked out the accompanying chart. It shows how quickly an automobile going at various speeds should be able to stop, providing the brake mechanism is efficient and road conditions average.

Smashed to splinters!

Yet the car was going only 15 miles an hour

MOST people think of a reckless driver as one who goes streaking along country roads at 50 miles an hour, or shooting through city streets faster than the law allows.

Yet official records show that 76% of all automobile accidents occur when the car is going 15 miles an hour or less.

Safety, for yourself and your car, is not a matter of how fast you are going, but how quickly you can stop.

Few motorists know how quickly they should be able to stop their car. Still fewer know the actual condition of their brakes. It is so easy to assume the brakes are right—until an emergency shows they are all wrong.

Don't take chances with your safety. The chart printed above shows how quickly your car should stop, at various speeds, if your brakes are in good condition, and working right.

How to avoid accidents

A simple inspection of your brakes at frequent intervals will make them a source of protection instead of danger. Perhaps a tightening of the brake rods, or an adjustment of the equalizer is all that is needed. The garage man will know if relining is necessary.

Why Thermoid Brake Lining is safest and wears longest

In each square inch of Thermoid brake lining there is 40% more material than in ordinary brake lining. This additional body gives a closer texture which is made tight and compact by hydraulic compression under 2000 lbs. pressure. In addition to this, Thermoid is Grapnalized, an exclusive process in manufacture which enables it to resist moisture, oil and gasoline.

The close, compact texture of Thermoid so processed causes it to wear down more slowly than ordinary brake lining and evenly so that it maintains its gripping power even when worn to wafer thinness.

The engineers and manufacturers of 51 of the leading passenger cars and trucks have standardized on Thermoid Hydraulic Compressed Brake Lining because it makes their cars safer.

Have your brakes inspected today.

Remember that every foot of Thermoid is backed by Our Guarantee: Thermoid will make good—or WE WILL.

campaign is proposed for the purpose of "arousing the church to a realization of the urgency of united effort in meeting the needs of the community, the nation and the world, and of inspiring and organizing the Christian forces to undertake an adequate world program. This field campaign to include a series of regional conferences, to be begun at the earliest possible moment."

A united survey of all fields is advised to ascertain actual needs. Also a united budget and treasury. The Transformation of Mr. Chang

By REV. Z. CHARLES BEALS, Hochow, China

ONE very hot afternoon in August, twenty-five years ago, a missionary was preaching in a street chapel in one of the Central China cities from the well-known and oft-used text, John 3 : 16, dwelling especially on the thought that whosoever will may be saved. He was very clear and earnest in delivering the message to the people who had gathered inside.

Chang, an opium sot, who was passing by, hearing the exhortation, came and sat down on the stone doorstep to listen, as he felt he was too dirty and filthy to enter the chapel. As he listened he became greatly interested in the message which the preacher was giving, and after a time he took courage and entered the chapel and took a seat in the rear, where he could hear and see more clearly.

As he sat there during the service, the thought came to him, "Why, 'whosoever' means me. The preacher says, Jesus can save me from my sins and give me eternal life." He was a dirty opium fiend, and he knew it, nevertheless he dared to ask the missionary if God could save a man as low and depraved as he was and take the craving all away from him. It was a large order, but the preacher knew that God had promised to save to the uttermost. So his answer came back quick and strong.

"Yes, Jesus can and will save if you ask him in believing prayer."

Mr. Chang then said, "Will you pray for me that I may get deliverance from this curse of opium, which has bound me like bands of iron these twenty years?"

The missionary and those present gladly volunteered to pray with him, and right there and then they knelt in earnest prayer.

The missionary, in relating the story to us, said that for three days they prayed and claimed salvation for him, and at the end of that time Chang came out happy, rejoicing and confident that his sins were forgiven and that he was saved and delivered from the curse of opium.

Afterward when Chang told us his life history, we rejoiced together with him in the saving power of God. The testimony of his former life is as follows: When his father died, he left Chang the family home and garden lot in the city. Chang had begun the smoking of opium before his father's death, and while he was teaching school. Soon after the funeral he began smoking heavily. The craving for the drug became very intense and he soon found that his money was not sufficient to supply him, so he began to sell his things about the house and garden.

As his craving became stronger, the furniture in the home was sold; then the house was mortgaged and afterward sold and smoked up. As the craving became more and more intense he began to sell his children one by one, then he sold his wife, and at last he was left alone. He became an outcast and wandered about from place to place, stealing and robbing in order to buy the drug to satisfy his longings. His clothes were filthy and covered with vermin. None would have him in their homes, so he used to sleep in the shrines by the wayside in summer, and when it got too cold he went to the haystacks by the farmyards.

He was, at the time he entered t chapel, in a destitute and desper condition, and as he heard the gra and glorious message that afterno he was constrained to listen as t missionary earnestly presented the sto of salvation to the lost and outca His entering the chapel and his accep ance of the offer of salvation chang the whole course of his life.

After his conversion Mr. Cha became a different man. The c cravings were gone, and he was indeec new man in Christ Jesus. Old thin had passed away and all things ha become new. He was very happy the Saviour's love, giving his testimo whenever opportunity afforded on t streets and in the highways a hedges.

He found a position where he cou teach shcool, but this did not keep hi from telling around what a deliveran he had from the dreadful curse a power of opium. He testified also the joy of salvation among his neighbo He also led the prayer meetings the chapel, and after a few years Bible study he was appointed a evangelist in the same city where he wa converted.

For over twenty years Mr. Chan has faithfully warned men regardin vices of all kinds, and pointed them to Saviour who can save them and brin peace and joy into their lives. He has traveled far and wide, preachin John 3 : 16, and telling how God ca transform a man's life. Eternity alon will reveal how many souls hav accepted Christ as Saviour by th faithful preaching of old Mr. Chang He is still telling the story and faith fully serving the Lord he loves s much. Would that we only had mor faithful evangelists in Central Chin like him.

We ask the Christian Herald reader to pray that many other opium victim may be saved, that they may have th opportunity of hearing the Gospel stor as Chang did, and be saved and de livered from their besetting sins. Ver many cities in China still have n chapel where the Gospel is preached Will our friends do their best to sen the light to those who are yet in heathe darkness and bound in fetters as stron as brass and iron? The doors of oppor tunity are wide open, but the laborer are few. Pray, work and give as neve before, to help save those needy million whom Christ came to save.

We have a very able preacher, Mr Liu, in an out-station, Hanshan, fo whom we are praying the Lord to sen us some one to support. We will nee $9 per month. The Lord has blessed u greatly this year. We have had th privilege of baptizing 44 persons, an we have a very large class of inquirer preparing for baptism. There are tw churches and three preaching place on our circuit. Mr. Liu has charge of three places when I cannot get there He is a most valuable man.

HE HAD passed the quarters of the Signal Corps before the thought of his letter came to his mind. Then he stopped ort, gave one agonizing glance toward barracks only a few feet away, real-d that it was nearly time for bed call d that he could not possibly make it he went back; whirled about and rted on a wild run like a madman er the ground he had just traveled. was not conscious of carrying on a in of thought as he ran; his only a was to get to the Y. All the pleasant phrases which had wed from his pen so easily but a few oments before seemed to flare now in ters of fire before his bloodshot eyes he bounded over the ground. To ink he should so have lowered himself d weakened his position as to write the girl who was soon to be the wife that contemptible puppy!

The bugles began to sound taps now re and there in the barracks as he w past, but they meant nothing to m. Breathless he arrived at the M. C. A. hut just as the last light s being put out. A dark figure stood the steps as he halted, entirely winded w, and tried to gasp out "Where is r. Hathaway?" to the assistant who s locking up.

"Oh, he left five minutes after you d," said the man with a yawn. The ctor came by in his car and took him ong. Say, you'll be late in getting in, rporal; taps sounded almost five inutes ago."

With a low exclamation of disgust d dismay Cameron turned and arted back again with a long, swinging ride, his face flushing hotly in the dark er his double predicament. He had ne back for nothing and got himself bject to a reprimand, a thing which he d avoided scrupulously since coming camp, but he was so miserable over e other matter that it seemed a thing no moment to him now. He was together occupied with metaphorically cking himself for having answered at letter; for having mailed it so soon ithout ever stopping to read it over or ve himself a chance to reconsider. He ight have known that Ruth Mac-onald was no comrade for him; that e was a neighbor of the Wainwrights nd would in all probability be a friend f the lieutenant's. Not for all that he wned in the world or hoped to own ould he thus have laid himself open the possibility of having Wainwright now any of his inner thoughts. He ould rather have lived and died nknown, unfriended, than that this hould come to pass.

And she? The promised wife of Vainwright! Could it be? She must ave written that letter to him merely rom a fine friendly patronage. All ight, of course, from her standpoint; ut from his, gall and wormwood to his roud spirit! Oh that he had not nswered it! He should have remembered that she had never been in his lass. Not that his people were not as ood as hers, and maybe better so far s intellectual attainments were con-erned; but they had lost their money, nd had lived a quiet life, and in her yes and the eyes of her family, were, ery likely, as the mere dust of the earth. Only now, just now, since war had set ts seal of sacrifice on all young men in niform, soldiers had risen to be set part for hero worship, nothing more. It was not her fault that she had been rought up that way, and that he seemed but a hero to her, and nothing more. She had shown her beautiful spirit in giving him the tribute that seemed worthiest to her. He would not blame her, nor despise her; but he would hold himself aloof as he had done in the past, and show her that he wanted no favors, no patronage. He was sufficient to himself. What galled him most was to think that perhaps in the intimacy of her engagement she might show his letter to Wainwright, and they would laugh together over him, a poor soldier, presuming to write as he had done to a girl in her station. They would laugh together, half pitifully—at least the woman would be pitiful; the man was likely to sneer. He could see Wainwright's hateful mustache curl now with scorn and his little eyes twinkle as he would tell her all the lies he had tried to put upon him in the past. He would give her a wrong idea of his character. He would rejoice and triumph to do so! Oh, the bitterness of it! It overwhelmed him so that the little matter of getting into his bunk without being seen by the officer in charge was utterly overlooked.

Perhaps some good angel arranged the way for him so that he was able to slip past the guards without being challenged. Two of the guards were talking at the corner of the barracks with their backs to him at the particular second when he came in sight. He took little precaution against being seen, his mind being so occupied with other matters, but walked quietly in. A minute later the guards turned back to their monotonous march and the shadow of the vanishing corporal had just disappeared from among the other dark shadows of the night landscape. Inside the barracks another guard welcomed him eagerly without questioning his presence there at that hour:

"Say, Cam, how about day after tomorrow? Are you free? Will you take my place on guard? I want to go up to Philadelphia and see my girl, and I'm sure of a pass, but I'm listed for guard duty. I'll do the same for you some time."

"Sure!" said Cameron heartily, and swung up stairs with a sudden realization that he had been granted a streak of good luck. Yet somehow he didn't seem to care much.

He tiptoed over to his bunk among the rows of sleeping forms, removed from it a box, a pair of shoes, three books, some newspapers and a mess kit which some lazy comrade had left there, and threw himself down with scant undressing. He was too upset to care about the little things of life tonight. Somehow it seemed as though a great calamity had befallen him, although when he tried to reason it out he could not understand how things were so much changed from what they had been that morning before he received that letter. Ruth Macdonald had never been anything in his life but a lovely picture. There was no slightest possibility that she would ever be more. She was like a distant star, to be admired but never approached. Had he been fool enough to have his head turned by her writing that kind letter to him? Had he even remotely fancied she would ever be anything nearer to him than just a formal friend who occasionally stooped to give a bright smile or do a kindness? Well, if he had, he needed this knockdown blow. It might be a good thing that it came so soon before he had let this thing grow in his imagination; but oh, if it had but come a bit sooner! If it had only been on the way over to the Y. M. C. A. hut instead of on the way back, that letter would never have been written! She would have set him down as a boor, perhaps, but what matter? What was she to him, or he to her? Well, perhaps he would have written a letter briefly to thank her for her offer of knitting, but it would have been an entirely different letter from the one he did write. He ground his teeth as he thought out the letter he should have written:

"My Dear Miss Macdonald (no 'friend' about that):

"It certainly was kind of you to think of me as a possible recipient of a sweater. But I feel that there are other boys who perhaps need these things more than I do. I am well supplied with all necessities. I appreciate your interest in an old school friend. The life of a soldier is not so bad, and I imagine we shall have no end of novel experiences before the war is over. I hope we shall be able to put an end to this terrible struggle very soon when we get over and make the world a safe and happy place for you and your friends. Here's hoping the men who are your special friends will all come home safe and sound and soon. Sincerely, J. CAMERON."

He wrote that letter over and over mentally as he tossed on his bunk in the dark, changing phrases and whole sentences. Perhaps it would be better to say something about "her officer friends" and make it very clear to her that he understood his own distant position with her. Then suddenly he kicked the big blue army blanket off and sat up with a deep sigh. What a fool he was! He couldn't write another letter. The letter was gone, and as it was written he must abide by it. He couldn't get it back or unwrite it, much as he wished. There wasn't any excuse or way to make it possible to write and refuse those sweaters and things, was there?

He sat staring into the darkness while the man in the next bunk roused to toss back his blanket which had fallen superfluously across his face, and to mutter some sleepy imprecations. But Cameron was off on the composition of another letter:

"MY DEAR MISS MACDONALD: I have been thinking it over and have decided that I do not need a sweater or any of those other things you mention. I really am pretty well supplied with necessities, and you know they don't give us much room to put anything around the barracks. There must be a lot of other fellows who need them more, so I will decline in order that you may give your work to others who have nothing, or to those who are your personal friends.
Very truly, J. CAMERON."

Having convinced his turbulent brain that it was quite possible for him to write such a letter as this, he flung himself miserably back on his hard cot again and realized that he did not want to write it. That it would be almost an insult to the girl, who, even if she had been patronizing him, had done it with a kind intent, and after all it wasn't her fault that he was a fool. She had a right to marry whom she would. Certainly he never expected her to marry him. Only he had to own to himself that he wanted those things she had offered. He wanted to touch something she had worked upon, and feel that it belonged to him. He wanted to keep this much of human friendship for himself. Even if she was going to marry another man, she had always been his ideal of a beautiful, lovable woman, and as such she should stay, even if she married a dozen officers!

It was then he began to see that the thing that was really making him miserable was that she was giving her sweet young life to such an unworthy creature as Wainwright. That was the real pain. If some fine, noble man like—well, like Captain La Rue, only younger, of course, should come along, he would be glad for her. But this excuse for a man! Oh, it was outrageous! How could she be so deceived? And yet of course women knew very little of men. They had no standards by which to judge them. They had no opportunity to see them except in plain sight of those they wished to please. One could not expect them to have discernment in selecting their friends. But what a pity! Things were all wrong! There ought to be some way to educate a woman so that she would realize the dangers all about her and be somewhat protected. It was worse for Ruth Macdonald, because she had no men in her family who could protect her. Her old grandfather was the only man in the house, and he was almost a hopeless invalid. What could he know of the young man who came to court his granddaughter? What did he remember of the ways of men, having been so many years shut away from their haunts?

The corporal tossed on his hard cot and sighed. There ought to be some one to protect her. Some one ought to make her understand what kind of a fellow Wainwright was! She had called him her knight, and a knight's business was to protect, yet what could he do? He couldn't go to her and tell her that the man she was going to marry was utterly without moral principle. He couldn't even send some one else to warn her. Whom could he send? His mother? No, his mother would feel shy and afraid of a girl like that. She had always lived a quiet life. He doubted if she would understand herself how utterly unfit a mate Wainwright was for a good pure girl. And there was no one else in the world that he could send. Besides, if she loved the man—and, incomprehensible as it seemed, she must love him or why should she marry him?—if she loved him she would not believe an angel from heaven against him. Women were that way—that is, if they were good women, like Ruth. Oh, to think of her tied up to that beast! He could think of no other word. In his agony he rolled on his face and groaned aloud.

"O God!" his soul cried out, "why do such things have to be? If there really is a God why does he let such awful things happen to a pure, good girl? The same old bitter question that had troubled the hard young days of his own life. Could there be a God who cared when bitterness was in so many cups? Why had God let the war come?"

Some time in the night the tumult in his brain and heart subsided and he fell into a profound sleep. The next thing he knew the kindly roughness of his comrades wakened him with shakes and wet sponges flying through the air, and he opened his consciousness to the world again and heard the bugle blowing for roll call. Another day had dawned grayly and he must get up. They set him on his feet, and bantered him into action. Presently he responded with his usual wit that set them all in howls of laughter, but as he stumbled into place in the line in the early dawning he realized that a heavy weight was on his heart which he could not throw off. What did it matter what Ruth Macdonald did with her life? He told himself fiercely she was nothing to him, never had been and never could be. If only he had not written that letter all would now be as it always had been. If only she had not written her letter! Or no! He put his hand to his breast pocket with a quick movement of protection. Somehow he was not yet ready to relinquish that one taste of bright girlish friendliness, even though it had brought a stab in its wake.

He was glad when the orders came for him and five other fellows to tramp across the camp to gas school and go through two solid hours of instruction ending with a practical illustration of the gas mask and a good dose of gas. It helped to put his mind on the great business of war, which was to be his only concern now until it or he were ended. He set his lips grimly and went about his work vigorously. What did it matter anyway what she thought of him? He need never answer another letter, even if she wrote. He need not accept the package from the post office. He could let them send it back—yes, refuse it and let them send it back. Then she might think what she liked! Perhaps she would suppose him already gone to France. Anyhow, he would forget her. It was the only sensible thing to do.

Meanwhile the letter had flown on its way with more than ordinary swiftness, as if it had known that a force was seeking to bring it back again. The Y. M. C. A. man was carried at high speed in an automobile to the nearest station and arrived in time to catch the Baltimore train. In the Baltimore station he mailed the letter just as the letter-gatherer arrived with his keys to open the box. So the letter lost no time, but was sorted and started northward before midnight, and by some happy chance arrived at its destination in time to be laid by Ruth Macdonald's plate at lunch the next day.

Some quick sense must have warned Ruth, for she gathered her mail up and slipped it unobtrusively into the pocket of her skirt before it could be noticed. Dottie Wetherill had come home with her for lunch, and the bright red Y. M. C. A. triangle on the envelope was so conspicuous. Dottie was crazy over soldiers and all things military. She would be sure exclaim and ask questions. She was of those people who always found everything about you that you did keep under absolute lock and key.

very day since she had written her ter to Cameron, Ruth had watched an answer, her cheeks glowing some- es with the least bit of mortification t she should have written at all to e received this rebuff. Had he after misunderstood her? Or had the ter gone astray or the man gone to front? She had almost given up pecting an answer now after so many eks, and the nice warm olive drab eater and neatly knitted socks with ra long legs and bright lines of color the top, with the wristlets and muf- , lay wrapped in tissue paper at the y bottom of the lowest drawer of her ffonier, where she would seldom see it d where no one else would ever find and question her. Probably by and , when the drafted colored men were t away, she would give them out to given to some needy man. She didn't ow. She felt somehow humiliated, d was beginning to tell herself that it s all her own fault and a good lesson her. She had even decided not to and see John Cameron's mother, lest t too might be misunderstood. It med that the frank, true instincts of own heart had been wrong, and she s getting what she justly deserved departing from Aunt Rhoda's ictly conventional code.

Nevertheless the letter in her pocket, ich she had not been able to look at efully enough to be sure if she knew writing, crackled and rustled and set heart beating excitedly, and she swered Dottie Wetherill's chatter with distraught monosyllables and absent smiles, hoping that Dottie would feel it necessary to depart soon after lunch.

But it presently became plain that Dottie had no intention of going home soon; she had come for a purpose, and she was plying all her arts to accomplish it. Ruth presently roused from her reverie to realize this and set herself to give Dottie as little satisfaction as possible. It was evident that she had been sent to discover the exact relation which Ruth held toward Harry Wainwright. Ruth strongly suspected that Dottie's brother Bob had been the instigator of the mission, and she had no intention of giving him the information he sought.

So Ruth's smiles came out and the inscrutable twinkle came into her lovely eyes, and Dottie chattered on sentence after sentence, paragraph after paragraph, theme after theme, always rounding up at the end with some perfectly obvious leading question. Ruth answered in all apparent innocence and sincerity, yet with an utterly different turn of the conversation from what had been expected, and with an indifference that was hopelessly baffling unless the young ambassadress asked a point-blank question, which she hardly dared to do of Ruth Macdonald without more encouragement. And so at last a long two hours dragged away, and finally Dottie Wetherill, at the end of her small string, and at a loss for more themes on which to trot around again to the main idea, reluctantly accepted her defeat and took herself away, leaving Ruth to her long-delayed letter.

he Christian Mastery of the Pacific

Matt. 28 : 16-20; Isa. 2 : 2-3

T IS not many years since the Pacific Ocean was a waste of mystery dotted with cannibal islands, a source of ird tales and a challenge to the mes- gers of the cross. England and Hol- nd by transplanting their civilization Australia, New Zealand, Java and alaysia, began the work of taking the cific for Christ. English mission- es, with a courage as fine as that of crusader, and American and other ssionaries took counsel of their faith d braved the dangers of the various ands. Spanish troops also made some the Pacific Island colonies safe for the eacher and his church. Upon the ndation laid imperfectly by the Span- n padres, American Protestant mis- ns are now raising Christian com- nities in the Philippines. In Japan, China, in Siam, in Malaysia, in India, ristian communities have sprung up ound faithful ministers and teachers ich are already influencing the course history in these regions and today ere are no untamed savages. But w the war has given Japan a wide out- ach in the Pacific, and even where she es not govern, her people live by thou- nds. It is not impossible that she ay dominate this area for many years come. And Japan though numbering any Christians among her people is t yet Christian. She waits to see the ith of Christ prove itself before her. issionaries say that foreign-born mis- naries will never convert Japan, that r Fujiyama, her Shintoism, her Bud- nism will only fall before a conquering panese Christian church. This the urches are seeking to create. There is w marvelous Christian unity in pan. It is not impossible that the Yankees of the East" will shortly come by faith into the company of the redeemed, and when Japan, accepting Christ, takes up the great commission we will begin to approach Christian mastery of the Pacific.

Our Relation to God (2) Trusting

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Psa. 91 : 1-16

THIS Psalm has been the comfort and consolation, the strength and support of thousands in danger and distress. Printed on light cards it was put into the hands of hundreds of our boys "Over There" and many of them have acknowledged its ministry. In the first division of this topic we discussed repenting. The next step is trusting. Having believed that Christ died for our sins and having repented and been forgiven, we naturally love him who has thus so wonderfully saved us. But he has said "follow me," and the path is not always smooth nor the way easy. When we meet trouble we either lose our trust and fall away, or we trust more intensely and win through. The child, through finding the earthly parent wise and kind and able to conquer the causes of childish woe, comes to trust the parent. He has tried him and found him sure. Similarly the child of God after years of experience of the power of God comes to trust him. But not far beyond trust lies love. We have believed, we have repented, we have trusted, we have found him greater than our faith, mightier than our trust, we have apprehended, thus, his great love for us, and we have loved him. God rules by law, but it is the law of infinite love. To those who trust in him he will reveal his love, his purposes, and his spirit, and to him who trusts until the last faint sunset of frail human life, he promises a glorious rising in that land of light where he stands waiting for his own.

Brought to Children These Supreme Food Delights

When you think of Puffed Grains as tidbits—as flavory bubbles or as food confections—also think of this:

They were created by Prof. A. P. Anderson, formerly of Columbia University, and for a scientific purpose.

They go through a long, heroic process. They are steam-exploded, shot from guns. Not to make them enticing dainties, but hygienic grain foods.

125 Million Explosions

Over 125 million explosions occur in each kernel of wheat, for instance. Every food cell is blasted for easy digestion. Every atom is fitted to feed.

Part of these food cells are broken by other methods of cooking. But this method alone breaks them all.

The result is easy, complete digestion. The stomach is not taxed. None of the whole-grain elements are lost.

Almond-Flavored Bubbles

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice come to you as bubbles, puffed to eight times normal size. They are flaky, flimsy, fascinating, and they taste like toasted nuts.

They seem at first almost too good to eat.

But they are foods—whole-grain foods, fitted for easy digestion. No other form of wheat or rice compares with them as food.

They are more than breakfast dainties. They are good between-meal foods—perfect good-night dishes. They make whole grains enticing and children need whole grains.

Serve with cream and sugar, with melted butter, or mix with fruit.

Float in every bowl of milk. Use as wafers in your soups.

Crisp and lightly butter for after-school confections.

Use like nut meats in home candy making, or as garnish on ice cream.

A Woman's Ideas on Church Union

LONG before reading in your issue of October 3 the article "The Church and the War" and the proceedings of the Religious Congress held at Pittsburg, I have had in mind and heart the necessity for some working union of the Christian churches of America. It seemed that such a large part of Christ's work on earth is now being done by organizations outside the Church—the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Belgian Relief. Why could not this wonderful work of the Master have been done by his Church? Of course, the answer is: The Church has no organization, no machinery for carrying on such work. Surely it was because his Church was not equal to these tasks that God should find it necessary to raise up other bodies for his service. Or perhaps it is that he has other work for his Church on earth that will require every bit of its united strength and effort.

Recently I have been intensely interested in letters in the Christian Herald giving the ideas of the clearest religious thinkers and leaders on the subject; but no plan seems to cover quite what the Christian world is looking for. Under God's guidance there will no doubt be evolved from the mass of many opinions some idea that will form the basis for an effective working plan, and I have wondered if the crude ideas of one so entirely "lay" as I, might suggest to wiser heads something that might be of service.

I believe it is a waste of time to try to unite the various denominations on doctrinal matters; that this is not possible, and if possible, would be of doubtful good; that each denomination should have freedom to believe as it pleases on non-essential matters of doctrine and forms of worship that now divide them; but that they should all work together, that there should be a central body, with proportionate representation from every denomination that wished to join; that when this central body decided on a definite work—such as the establishment of a world-wide peace, or the prevention of the possibility of another war, or the evangelization of the world—it would call on each denomination for so many workers, and each denomination would furnish its quota; it would call on each denomination for so much money, and each denomination would divide up the amount of its quota among all its own churches, and each church among its own members; and the best thought, the necessary workers and the funds would be forthcoming. There are some things that every church wants to bring to pass, and would work for together, no matter how variant their creeds and beliefs and forms of worship.

This view is expressed by a member of a church which emphasizes the one doctrine "Christ and him crucified," and which meets every claim of superiority of one creed over another with the maxim "In essentials unity; in non-essentials liberty; in all things charity."

With expressions of good will for the Christian Herald and its work, I am, etc.,

(MISS) KATE WURRESCHKE.

Testaments for Invalid Soldiers

To the Christian Herald:

Your note, under date of December 12th with reference to New Testaments for use in this Hospital, has been received. You recall in your note the fact of your having furnished one thousand Testaments some months ago, for use among the patient personnel here, and suggest that you will be able to furnish further supply of Testaments, if we are in need of them. Your note is indeed very welcome, since our supply is almost exhausted, and we shall be more than grateful if you will furnish five hundred or one thousand copies for our use. I want to compliment you upon the sensible size and general finish and appearance of the Testament which you have put out. Our workers here like it very much, and it has been greatly appreciated and profitably used by the patients through the Hospital.

G. CHARLES GRAY,
1st Lieut. Chaplain.
U. S. A. Base Hospital, Ft. Riley, Kans.

In response to the foregoing letter, a further supply of 1,000 Testaments, sent in two packages of 500 each, has been forwarded to Lieut. Chaplain Gray for use among the soldier invalids in the hospital. These Testaments, which are the gift of our readers, are greatly appreciated by the recipients.

United States to Help Armenia

AT THE Thanksgiving service in my church, attended by Baptists, Methodists and my people, I suggested, after preaching, that we make an offering for Armenian orphans—which was done. I enclose check for the same, $13.16. Will you be so kind as to acknowledge it through your paper, so I may announce it to the congregation.

Marion Harland's Corner

Cooks in Council

THERE are cookery terms so often used in recipes that probably everyone ought to know their sig- cance, but certainly some do not. behalf of such will the Corner kind- define these:

"'Au gratin' appears in so may recipes taining grated cheese that it might that that is the article called for. t 'fromage' is the French for cheese; at does the other mean?

'A recent recipe mentions a 'roux,' t as if it were a thing in common use. at is it? The same thing may be d of 'soubise' and 'salmi' and soufflé.'

'And while appealing to a recognized thority, let me ask the correct spell- and pronunciation of the dish named some 'pilau,' others 'pilaf,' etc. va- usly. It is a concoction of chicken d rice, suitably and tastily doctored h other ingredients. It is often pro- nced as if spelled 'purlieu'!

'What advantage has 'a dash of pap- a' over a common 'pinch of pepper'?

'A few weeks ago, one of the corre- ndents complained that her family ed of her ways of preparing potatoes. d she never given the old-fashioned rman Fried' not in deep fat, as the ench Fried,' but sliced thin and wned in a skillet slightly greased,— ely enough to keep them from stick-? Either the raw or the cold boiled tatoes are very toothsome so pre- red. A variation is to broil them over , as steak.

'Another common mode is to pack shed potatoes in a pieplate or other llow dish that may be brought on the table, smooth carefully, and bake a good color in the oven. They may moistened, if desired, with a little aten egg before putting into the oven.

"A FLORIDA CORNERITE."

Some of our best Manuals of Cookery, ticipating the possible ignorance of inary technical terms—even on the rt of readers who can read and speak ench—have appended to the body their books a glossary of words in mmon use in the preparation of cer- n "made dishes."

From one of these, which lies at my ow, I extract the answers to your eries.

1. "Au gratin" signifies a dish cov- d with fine crumbs and browned.

2. "Roux." Butter and flour cooked gether and stirred to a smooth cream ile in cooking.

3. "Soubise." A sort of onion sauce ten with meat.

4. "Soufflé." A pudding—sweetened unsweetened—corresponding to what s formerly known as a "trifle," ipped to a standing froth and baked ickly.

5. "Pilau" is an Oriental dish of at and rice—pronounced in French d several other languages "peelaw" sometimes "peelow," and once in a ile "peelaffe." In no language that know of is it pronounced "purlieu."

6. "Paprika" is a more spicy con- ment than the common black pepper general use.

It is but natural that the French, o are the finest cooks in the world, ould give their own tongues to what the call "fancy dishes." These have en adopted by so many culinary ex- rts that we seldom question the mean- g of the terms.

"Can you slip into our Corner a recipe which I have found so excellent that I desire to give other housemothers the benefit of it?

Boston Brown Bread

"2 cups corn meal;
"2 cups rye or graham;
"3 cups sour milk;
"4 large spoons of molasses;
teaspoon salt;
"2 heaping teaspoons of soda;

"Steam 4 hours; bake ½ hour. Water may be used in place of milk with one heaping teaspoonful of soda. This has never failed. I may come again, as I have made quite a study of cookery."—MRS. G. W. S. (Indiana).

Such students are just what we need in our Corner Councils. Let us share in the results of your faithful work.

"With eggs at 75 cents per dozen I find it cheaper to settle coffee by putting in an egg-shell instead of using the beaten whites. I save all of the egg-shells and keep them in a paper-bag to keep out dust, using them to settle coffee.—M. E. W. (Georgia).

A bit of wise economy we pass on to other women. "Eggs must come down," say the wiseacres who affect to have prophetic vision. Perhaps so, but not in mid-winter! And in the spring we shall, with an eye to the near future, hoard them for "setting." Moral—save your egg-shells—not draining them before putting them away, the open sides up to retain every drop of the "white." It does not lose virtue in drying.

"Will you please publish in the Corner the recipe for Ginger Snaps referred to in your Christmas number as 'warranted to keep well and long if locked up?' I shall be very much obliged to you if you will do me this favor."—Mrs. E. R. M. (Kansas).

I transcribe with pleasure the recipe, just as I copied it forty-odd years ago, from my mother's manuscript "Receipt-book." (They did not say or write "recipe" then!) Said volume was sallowed by age and tattered (and then mended) by long and diligent usage. But this was just what her dear hands had written down, and what we had reaped the benefit of since we were babies.

Ginger Snaps

"One large cup of butter and lard mixed; one coffeecupful of sugar; one cupful of molasses; half a cupful of water; one even tablespoonful of ginger; one level tablespoonful of cinammon; one scant teaspoonful of cloves; one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in hot water. Flour for a pretty stiff dough.

"Roll out rather thinner than you would roll sugar-cakes, and bake quickly. (Mem. These ginger-snaps will keep for weeks—if locked up!)"

The deft housemother who invented and made countless hundreds of these little cakes in the course of a long and useful life, had a sense of quiet humor that lightened many a task for her.

We have room for but one section of a letter from a valued Minnesota member. She has sent a batch of recipes which will appear later:

"Now for my problem!

"How can I keep a dinner hot for an hour or two after it is done, so that it will be appetizing? I have to wait before serving nearly all meals on account of the nature of my husband's business, and they never are good when eaten, although quite presentable when cooked."—MRS. H. K. (Minnesota).

Borrow an idea from the makers of fireless cookers and "thermos" bottles. Put the vessels containing the cooked foods in deep saucepans of boiling water; cover all closely and set at the back of the stove where they will not cook but will retain the warmth for hours. If you have an old blanket or wadded coverlet which will envelop all the vessels, you may wrap it closely over them, and set away in a warm corner, being careful to exclude the outer air from them.

An Epoch-Making Dinner

To Introduce This New-Type Pork and Beans

Some years ago the Van Camp scientific cooks gave an epoch-making dinner. It was given in the Van Camp laboratories—to experts and laymen—to introduce the ideal Pork and Beans.

Since then that dish has brought to millions an entirely new idea of baked beans.

Direct Our Chefs

Now these scientific cooks direct every step of the process. And they constantly watch the results. So all the delights which they developed are found in every dish of Van Camp's.

They Studied the Dish for Years

These culinary experts, college trained, studied this dish for years.

They found that beans differ vastly. So now they analyze the beans.

They found that hard water made the skins tough. So they now free the water from minerals.

They found that ordinary ovens left beans under-baked. Digestion was difficult. Yet the beans were crisped and broken by the heat.

So they bake Van Camp's in steam ovens—bake them for hours at 245 degrees. Digestion is made easy, yet the beans are not crisped, not broken.

And they created a sauce to bake with them—a sauce of wondrous zest. In perfecting this sauce they tested 856 recipes.

Now these ideal Pork and Beans are always at your call. You can serve baked beans which are whole and mealy, instead of crisped and broken. You can have them easy to digest. And the finest tomato sauce ever created is baked into every atom.

Compare them with the old style.

The Ten Commandments

International Sunday School Lesson for February 16

Ex. 20:1-17

The Commandments in Modern Life

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WHEN Moses under God's leading built a nation from a rabble of escaping slaves, he began with a basic code of moral laws. These cover the spiritual attitude of the individual and the common conduct of social intercourse. They can never be outgrown or left behind. Their all-inclusiveness and permanence testify that they are indeed God's will concerning the fundamental things. He not only spake thus to Moses, but he reiterates these laws to every age and to every soul.

I remember when certain men sneered at President Roosevelt, saying that he had "discovered the Ten Commandments." As a matter of fact they bitterly resented his vigorous application of them to modern life: to big business, to profiteering and to social injustices. But we who revere these mighty principles know that Roosevelt was right and that the Commandments need constantly to be rediscovered, reinterpreted, and reapplied where they fit our present life. Why, these eternal simplicities even are actually unknown to savages, to whole groups of heathen in non-Christian lands, and to a large extent to the ignorant and the neglected in America itself.

The First Table and Men of Today

The first four laws deal with man and nation in their relation to God himself, and are neglected most frequently by the great majority. We lack the recognition of the Divine! To those primitive Hebrews living in an age of too many gods, the very first commandment was directed against polytheism. We today are in an age of different danger—the danger of no God at all.

I. Yet there is a sense in which we still have many gods, even those who think they have none. Martin Luther well said, "Whatever thy heart clings to and relies upon, that is properly thy God." Alas, then, too many still worship Mammon, the god of gold, of possessions, of things to own. Alas, too many worship not Jehovah, God of holiness and duty, but a new god of pleasure, or even the ancient Bacchus, god of wine.

Another sense in which we are apt to have more than one god is this: we think it quite right to conduct our homes in dependence upon our Heavenly Father and his teachings through Jesus of mutual service and love. But when we go out to business we run that on another basis entirely. There we bow down before a heathen god of self-interest, of doubtful ethics and dishonorable rites.

The German people afford a colossal illustration of modern polytheism—they believed in the God of Christ for the home and for intercourse within the nation, but in international relations they trusted "the good old German gott," Thor, the pagan god of force and ruthlessness. Who shall say that they alone are guilty of this?

II. No longer is there danger of the idolatry of graven images—thinking people would not dream of such a thing. Isaiah, in Chapter 44, dealt a crushing blow to idol-worship, and the Jewish conception of God as Spirit dominates the world. Yet we do have very faulty conceptions of God, wrong portrayals of him on every hand. People in numbers are still thinking of him as capricious, vengeful, unreasoning, angry and more or less unjust! Others are setting up and worshiping a crudely graven thought of the Almighty, as arbitrary in his requirements, a foe, to harmless merriment, or a stickler for theological definitions which divide his people.

The God of Holiness and Truth

III. The third commandment is clearly directed to the sanctity of oaths. When a man makes a declaration of fact, and calls upon God to witness, he must be absolutely honest. When a man makes an agreement and swears to it before God, he must keep it, even "to his own hurt." Jesus felt that here as elsewhere true men should go much further than the letter of the law. The oath ought to be unnecessary, men ought always to speak truth, "swear not at all." But a brief experience in the court-room makes one realize that the most solemn oath deters few bad men from perjury, and the carefulest contract will not hold a swindler.

The sin of lying! How insidious it is, in the life of a schoolboy, in the emergencies of business or politics, even in international diplomacy! We have just had an example of a great nation making a colossal exhibition of lying and false swearing. Germany broke her plighted word to Belgium; her sworn treaty was but "a scrap of paper." Moreover, she filled the world with lying propaganda, and fed her own people on lies. Now the house built on sand has collapsed. Truthfulness is vindicated in the earth. Liars hurt everybody, but they hurt themselves most!

The sin of profanity! Is it on the increase? One of the worst features of army and navy life is the thoughtless, constant stream of bad language all too often heard. Yet Christ taught "I say unto you that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment." Profanity of speech makes for profanity of life, tends to the lower, opens the way for evil.

IV. The Sabbath Day is coming into its own as the world's rest day. Back of it stand like a bulwark not only the churches, but now also the organized labor of the world, the dictates of health authorities and the experience of students of social welfare. Yet we still have much to do even here. Men are obliged to work seven days a week in too many occupations, and greed constantly tends to invade man's right to rest.

But while Deuteronomy bases this commandment on the rights of labor (Deut. 5:14, 15) Exodus has in view also the need for a time of spiritual refreshment, of opportunity for worship, of room for the divine. It is this which is the more in danger of being crowded out of modern life. The rest day is being devoted to the pleasure chase, where it is not invaded by toil or need. Prayer and worship are not the Sunday concern of the great majority. Yet the way we spend Sunday classifies us spiritually as definitely as any other test could. Selfish people seek a good time only. Sociable family folks visit and fellowship together. Bad people gamble, or drink, or otherwise gratify their inclinations to evil. Christ's loyal disciples meet to remember him, to look upward, to consider the larger affairs of his kingdom, to pray, to study God's word, and incidentally to have the best of fellowship and the finest kind of a "good time," where sane and spiritual religion is found.

The Second Table and the Spirit of Christ

All the philosophers and the moralists follow the enduring statutes of the Second Table of the Law. These have to do with our relationship to one another under God, and in a sense furnish a basis for public morality and civil law as well. Understanding them literally, there are too many of us who say "not guilty" after each when it is recited in the congregation. Yet few are guiltless even of the very letter of the Ninth and Tenth Laws—the sin of slander, the vice of gossip, are rife in all communities; and as for envy, the root of covetousness, how many hearts are entirely free from this?

But upon every point of the Decalogue Christ has stamped his personality for Christians, setting a standard so much higher by his spirit that we all feel a e of weakness and failure and need ivine help. For the seventh, he re- es complete purity of thought as as deed. For the sixth, an absence engefulness and hatred against our ws; yes, even an absence of con- pt! When we realize how sublime Jesus' ideal in all these respects we tate to repeat the rich young ruler's y, "All these have I kept from my th." Instead, we echo the litany with heartfelt contrition, and feel a solemn awe as we say of each command of the ten, "Lord, have mercy upon us and incline our hearts to keep this law." To keep them from the heart and in the spirit of Jesus is something different in approach and in possibilities from the method of the Pharisees. Jesus' way is harder to attain in all its fulness, but it is easier to begin and sweeter to walk as we go farther and farther on.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN

Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

The Public School and the Sunday School in Japan

ONE of the livest questions in Japan today, as in other countries, is the moral and religious racter foundation of its children young people. Commissions of cators are visiting America from an for a close study of educational ditions and to report their impres- s of the relation between religious secular education in America.

ne of these commissions, consisting some ten principals of middle and her schools from all parts of Japan, in this country a few months ago. he World's Sunday School Asso- ion was apprised of their coming arranged that the commission uld be met in a number of im- tant cities by Christian educators by leaders in the Sunday school d.

ne of the remarkable results of this tact with their Christian leaders the statement by the chairman of t commission upon his return, hough not a Christian, that he de- d above all else to be like those istian personalities whom he had here and who had impressed him their spirit and downright earnest- s in work for their fellows. And se impressions, especially as concern- several of these Americans of large iness, were written up by these Jap- se educators in a Japanese magazine a million and a half of circulation. nd now another group of eight ncipals of the Tokyo public schools n America. In Pittsburg they were nosphered by educational and Sunday ool leaders, were given the oppor- ity of facing 4,000 of Pittsburg's chers, and after various functions ited on Sunday morning a Presby- ian Sunday school.

t Philadelphia they came in contact h Hon. John Wanamaker, who prom- d them eight Bibles as a memento of ir visit.

These Bibles were later presented to se educators for Mr. Wanamaker by . William Jay Schieffelin at his home New York, in a beautiful address in ich Mr. Schieffelin referred to the ble as the foundation of the Christian estry of the home.

Mr. Moriya, the chairman of the rty, in replying said that he had heard t England had created Shakespeare, but that the Bible had made England. The guests then inspected some old Bibles in the possession of the Schieffelin family, one of them 700 years old and one 350 years old, the latter printed during Luther's lifetime.

The eight visitors also were guests at the Bushwick Avenue Central Methodist Sunday School of Brooklyn, and made a careful study of the departmental and educational plans of the school.

And then they were in Boston during the Christmas holidays. Special plans were made for their entertainment in Christian homes during the holidays so that they might catch the real Christmas spirit. They visited the Christmas entertainments at several Sunday schools and were present at a community Christmas entertainment at Malden under the leadership of Professor Walter S. Athearn of Boston University.

That the Sunday school is becoming a profound force in Japan in its impress upon the educational leaders of the empire is witnessed to by a remarkable statement from the lips of Baron Sakatane during the course of a reception to Dr. H. H. Meyer at Tokyo under the auspices of the Sunday school leaders.

Baron Sakatane said: "During these six years great changes have taken place in Japan, and we realize more than ever before that we must give more attention to religion. One recent movement in Japan is toward a complete revision of the educational system. I am a member of the committee that has this revision in charge, and am glad to say that one thing that we have in mind in this reconstruction is the emphasis on religious ideas and imparting them to children. I really think one of the influences that has been at work to bring this change is the Sunday school movement, and this is another reason why we welcome the convention."

Baron Shibusawa said at that same gathering that he was greatly impressed with the possibilities of the Sunday school, and especially as he had noted the work when he visited the school superintended by Mr. Wanamaker in Philadelphia.

Count Okuma said there was coming a new cooperation between America and Japan—a cooperation in the world of the spirit as well as business—and that his country owed no greater debt to America than for the teaching of Christian ideals, and he believed these ideals would find a place in all phases of the life of Japan.

The Lord's Day Alliance

THE Lord's Day Alliance of the United States has decided to hold thirty-first Annual Meeting and nvention at the National Capital, cember 11-14, 1919. Plans have eady been started for making this ies of meetings in Washington of tion-wide significance, and the min- ers' associations, pastors and churches the various denominations will ar- nge to have delegates present. The stors of Washington will have the bject of the Sabbath considered in eir pulpits simultaneously on the t Sunday of January or a convenient nday in February.

It was brought out at the Alliance etings in New York City, November -12, that the problem of Sabbath secration will constitute one of the eatest problems of reconstruction. prominent speakers the following re especially noticeable for their dec- rations on this great issue: Hon. Jo- phus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy; Henry van Dyke; John Wanamaker, former Postmaster General of the United States, and Hon. Thomas E. Rush, Surveyor of the Port of New York.

Mr. E. F. Nicholls, who booked the speakers for the United War Work Campaign, expressed the opinion that the United States would witness the greatest flood of the Continental Sunday sweeping over it after the war that had ever been experienced in the history of our country.

It is plain that only the greatest effort put forth by the Lord's Day Alliance, its auxiliary societies, churches and other cooperating agencies, will be able to meet the dangerous situation.

The plans for the convention at Washington a year hence will be developed along a practical line for meeting conditions as they obtain today, and for plans to handle this important question, both in the United States and other countries of the world.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

TODAY, Christian Herald comrades, I want you to go a-Maying with me! Ah, yes, it is snowy, blustery February, I know. Nevertheless, right here in this big wintry city of New York there is blooming a flower which is soon to be transplanted to the soil of your own home towns and villages and which is going to fade and die, or take root and thrive, according to whether or not you have prepared the ground for it.

Some villages are already awaiting it: reverently, joyously. Others have heard the story of its shy budding—over there on the battlefields of France—but know nothing of its later growth: its marvelous blooming in continental hospital and convalescent station, on home-coming transport and in the pain-filled wards of our debarkation hospitals here. There are even towns and villages which seem not to have heard of this flower at all. One dreads to think what will befall it there.

But we were going a-Maying, were we not? We were going out to find this delicate flower, to take it into our hearts and shelter it from possible blasts of indifference or mockery.

Very well; then let us board a certain New York car, alight before a great debarkation hospital, and (showing our passes) pass into this House of Pain and High Courage.

The pain is here—ah yes. In one ward are broken bodies; in another dulled minds; in another sightless eyes. Here is a forest of crutches. There are forms stretched on cots. Yonder are crippled young figures, in bath robes, hobbling about cheerfully. And everywhere there is pain.

The heart rebels. It is too much. We turn back blindly toward the corridor.

But we do not reach it. A young blue-eyed soldier playfully thrusts out his crutch and stops us.

"Don't hurry off. We haven't had any one to talk to today."

We go back. And they gather around us: these blithe lads. The jokes fly to and fro. Presently we remember the red apples tucked away in our pockets ('spite stern directions to leave all food at the door), and the bars of chocolate, the puzzles and the new games. These are greeted rapturously. The "eats" disappear to the last brown crumb playfully plucked off a comrade's dressing-gown. The games are tried out; the puzzles worked.

Then—with our time almost up, and the dusk settling down on the city like a benediction—we find the boys talking to us seriously, quietly about the war. We ask some questions, and they answer them. Presently there arises a controversy over a trench song.

"It's a verse from Matthew," one declares.

This is disputed, and the first lad, gathering up his crutches, quickly thumps across the ward to his distant cot, reaches under his pillow and comes back, with a Bible so worn from handling that it is falling apart. He can't find the text, but some one else can. The young heads—brown and yellow and red and black, and bandaged—bend over the boy with the Book. At last the verse is found and read aloud.

"We sang that," the first boy explains. "It went like this."

Some sing with him. Some sit quiet. But suddenly we sense, blooming all about us in the dusk, the little white flower of faith: honest, boyish, newborn faith in God.

Reverently we listen: listen while—earnestly and eagerly and without any self-consciousness—these boys, from every walk in life, from every race and sect, from Christian and unChristian homes, tell what the Bible has come to mean to them, how they love to read and discuss it; and how different all this is from "before the war" days.

"I never used to take any stock in church," declares one.

"Nor I. But I'm going to join some church now."

"So'm I. The first day I get out of here."

"Say," concludes another, on crutches, "this war's done a lot for me."

Overwhelmed, we bid them goodnight and hurry out to the roaring, clanging night streets. The sounds and sights—all the materialism of everyday life—are like an assault upon us. And a terror comes over us: a fear for that flower blooming in the dusk of the quiet ward. We know that New York City cannot destroy the flower. These boys from home firesides in the West and North and South care not a fig for what New York City thinks.

No; the flower will survive their brief stay here. They will carry it homeward with them, just as that little torn Bible will travel in an overcoat pocket, and boyish lips will tremble with the confidences exchanged in the twilit wards.

Then will come the plunge into a town and home circle.

It will all rest with us, fellow stay-at-homes, what happens then. Either the exaltation will fade, the old boyish self-consciousness about religion come back and the little worn Bible be tucked away on a dusty shelf. Or else your Sir Galahad and mine, your dear boy and mine, will find in the home town, in the home circle, a responsiveness and appreciation born, not of the experiences of the battlefield perhaps, but of a faith and earnestness greater even than those of his soldier comrades.

And as the days pass, and he unites with a church, our soldier will (if we be still true to our trust) find within it the vital thing he expects to find. Its members will be what he dreams of their being. Its activities will prove satisfying. And so the white flower of faith which a thoughtless boy had to cross the world to find will bloom, for a thoughtful man, in that little home church while his life lasts.

Neighborhood Bible-Study Class

The most inspiring gathering of neighbors for companionship and mutual help it has ever been my privilege to attend was a Bible Study Class held once a week in our neighborhood.

It was an hour well spent: uniting people of all denominations. Of course all sectarianism was eliminated. Otherwise the plan would have failed.

We took one chapter at a time, commencing with St. John, as that is easier to begin with. We had one set of questions for all chapters, which we used at every meeting. These questions helped us study the chapters, bringing out the main thoughts in each. Every member of the Bible Study Class owned a copy of the questions, bringing it each time. The questions were:

1. What is the principal subject?
2. What is the leading lesson?
3. What is the best verse?
4. Teaching concerning Christ?
5. Example to follow?
6. Error to avoid?
7. Promise to claim?
8. Prayer to echo?

Although these were the questions always asked, the leader of our Bible Study Class did not confine himself or herself to them; but brought out (by additional queries) any thought not coming directly under the regular questions. Our discussion was very free and spontaneous; everything of a sectarian nature being avoided. It is surprising how easy it is to do this, if every one is willing to for the sake of the others. And I cannot tell you what strength and help for the coming week we gained from those earnest discussions.

Any neighborhood can have such a Bible Study Class. The director need not be a trained instructor. Provided his attitude is right, and he has the cooperation of the others, the Class low fortunate the soldier who re- ns to find his home community ding such gatherings as that! How ply and easily he will slip in to se meetings! The following adven- e offers some suggestions to towns ich have not yet faced this problem.

ials for Young People of All Churches wonder if any of the Neighbors , as I do, in a small town where the ef amusements are picture-shows l dances? At least—this was the dition in our little Middle-West age until some of us saw the effect it on the young folks and provided ething better.

o be sure, nearly all of our own ng people were identified with one the five churches in town; but ny other young folks from the out- e came here to make temporary mes during the school year in order to eive the benefits of our really ellent High School; and these boys l girls were rather rudderless, drift- with the tide.

Something had to be done. So, ing the principal of the High hool into our consultation, together h the officers of each Young People's ciety, we decided to give a series of ocials" in the truest sense of the rd. The young people of each urch and those in the High School re invited, and the gatherings were ld in the various church parlors. These "socials" have proved a great ccess; and we are holding them today. ree goals are kept in sight in arrang- the programs: first, to provide a y for the young people of the town become better acquainted with ch other and with the students from her localities; second, to break up the irit of rivalry and aloofness which, d to relate, has often characterized e attitude of the young people of the fferent churches; and, third, and far st important, to bring before the ung people a realization of the portance of the churches in the life of community, and to give them a help- g hand to higher, nobler ideals and aner living, offered through the church. A special program is given at each cial in which the guests themselves ke part, after which come spirited mes and attractive refreshments. he plan is to hold these gatherings ten enough to crowd out some of the ore objectionable and material amuse- ents open to young people here.— N INTERESTED READER.

Our next adventure is equally prac- cal, including not only the young lks of the churches, but grown-ups too.

Church Organizes Community Reading Circle

I desire to relate an Adventure in eighboring which I enjoyed very uch and which changed the whole ne of our community.

It was announced at church that we ould meet all the people of the eighborhood at a given time, to rganize a Rural Reading Circle. The eople came, and we organized with a rge membership. A President, Vice- resident, Secretary and Librarian were lected. A constitution with by-laws as adopted.

The members provided the books om their homes, retaining individual wnership of same, and the books were irculated among the members. Two eeks was allowed for the reading of ne book.

This writer was elected President; and part of his task was providing programs for the young people's meetings which the Reading Circle held on Sunday afternoons. These meetings were for profit and pleasure both, consisting of Bible readings, songs, select readings from the circulated books, recitations, talks, and so on. The young people gladly responded when put on the program. The meetings were opened and closed with prayer, and had a religious trend throughout. They were very much liked, well attended, and proved to be stepping-stones to lives of Christian service for many of our young people.

If there is any community which has never had a Reading Circle, I hope this account of mine will encourage it to get up one this winter.—W. N. BLACK, Texas.

And now, fellow Adventurers, fellow workers for the future good of this nation we love, and the home town and family circle especially dear to our hearts—may the little flower of boyish faith so soon to bloom at our doorsteps send down its roots and send up its blossoms, filling all the air with sweetness and bringing into the life of our communities a beauty which has never been there before.

The Neighbors' Forum

My boy had become of age in time for the second draft; and the hour was appointed in which he was to be examined by the local board to determine his fitness for service. Going into a room alone to commit him to God's care and gain resignation, myself, I thought of the 91st Psalm. I wrote it and laid it in his Bible. Imagine my joy when two days later, I opened the Christian Herald and found the Psalm printed on the Neighboring page: expressly for the soldier boy. We have found great comfort in it, and I doubt not many others have.—A BOY'S MOTHER.

A lonely country girl would like to correspond with friends from the age of thirty to thirty-five.—M. B.

It would be utter nonsense for me to attempt to tell how much I have enjoyed each one of the sweet letters I have received from the Christian Herald Neighbors. There is no pleasure I enjoy more. One can't imagine how lonely it is away out in the country. I am truly grateful.—MISS A. E. ATKINSON.

I want to take this opportunity of telling all the Neighbors how much I enjoy their adventures. They are so interesting and human, especially to one far from the homeland.—EMMA L. G. HINGSBURG, Porto Rico.

Our women voted to join hands with the principal of our grade school and township High School, to help him create and maintain a Bureau of Employment for our boys and girls who wished to keep busy and earn a little money. This bureau helped the young people to find such work as running errands, raking leaves, reading to those whose eyes are failing, tending baby and so on. It was highly successful.— A. B. W., Illinois.

Dear Neighbors: I have received a most sincere and touching appeal from a mother of four little ones—one of them a sick baby—who has gone to a big city to live, after living in a small fishing village where she knew everyone. She is a stranger, and very lonely. She has asked me what lonely mothers, such as she, can do in a strange city, to draw friends and neighbors about her. Have you anything to suggest? If so, address your letters to her in my care.—VERA L. CONNOLLY.

Dear Miss Connolly: There were addresses on some of the letters I have received from Christian Herald Neighbors which I could not make out; and I may have not have sent my replies to the correct address. On this chance, I want to thank, through your columns, all those who have written to me. Could they know the enjoyment I have received from the letters, and how I have read them over and over, they would not think their efforts in vain.—MRS. W. C. T.

An Old Man at Fifty
A Young Man at Seventy

The Remarkable Story of Sanford Bennett, a San Francisco Business Man, Who Has Solved the Problem of Prolonging Youth

By V. O. SCHWAB

There is no longer any occasion to go hunting for the Spring of Eternal Youth. What Ponce de Leon failed to discover in his world-famous mission, ages ago, has been brought to light right here in staid, prosaic America by Sanford Bennett, a San Francisco business man. He can prove it, too, right in his own person. At 50 he was partially bald. Today he has a thick head of hair, although it is white. At 50 his eyes were weak. Today they are as strong as when he was a child. At 50 he was a worn-out, broken-down, decrepit old man. Today he is in perfect health, a good deal of an athlete, and as young as the average man of 35.

All this he has accomplished by some very simple and gentle exercises which he practices for about ten minutes before arising in the morning. Yes, many of the exercises are taken in bed, peculiar as this may seem. As Mr. Bennett explains, his case was not one of preserving health, but one of rejuvenating a weak, middle-aged body into a robust old one, and he says what he has accomplished anyone can accomplish by the application of the same methods, and so it would seem. All of which puts the Dr. Osler theory to shame. There isn't room in this article to go into a lengthy description of Mr. Bennett's methods for the restoration of youth and the prevention of old age. All this he tells himself in a book which he has written, entitled "Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention." This book is a complete history of himself and his experiences, and contains complete instructions for those who wish to put his health and youth-building methods to their own use. It is a book that every man and woman who is desirous of remaining young after passing the fiftieth, sixtieth, seventieth, and as Mr. Bennett firmly believes, the one hundredth milestone of life, should read.

PARTIAL CONTENTS

Some idea of the field covered by the author may be gained by the following topics: Old Age, Its Cause; How to Prevent It; The Will in Exercising: Exercising in Bed—shown by fifteen pages of illustration. Sun, Fresh Air and Deep Breathing for Lung Development; The Secret of Good Digestion; Dyspepsia; How I Strengthened My Eyes; The Liver; Internal Cleanliness—how it removes and prevents constipation and its many attendant ills; external cleanliness; Rheumatism; Varicose Veins in the Legs; The Hair; The Obese Abdomen; The Rejuvenation of the Face, Throat and Neck; The Skin, and many other experience chapters of vital interest.

DON'T SEND ANY MONEY

"Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention, with its 400 pages profusely illustrated and handsomely bound in cloth, contains as much material as many Courses of Instruction selling for $25 or more. But you can secure a copy of this book for only $3. Before committing yourself in any way, however, the publishers will send you "Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention" on approval without deposit. Sanford Bennett's system, as fully described and illustrated in his book, increases nerve force and nerve energy, benefiting every organ of the body—the brain included—by keeping the vertebrae of the spinal column young, flexible, elastic, and in perfect alignment. If, after examination in your own home, you feel you can afford to be without youth and health, send the book back within five days and you will owe nothing. If you decide to keep it, send your check for $3. There are no strings to this offer. No money is required in advance. Merely fill out and mail the coupon and by return post "Old Age—Its Cause and Prevention" will be sent to you at once.

For having solved the problem of prolonging youth during life, the world owes Sanford Bennett a vote of thanks. Of course, there are those who will scoff at the idea, but the real wise men and women among those who hear of Sanford Bennett will most certainly investigate further and at least acquire a knowledge of his methods. This the publishers will allow you to do without cost or obligation, through their "send no money" offer. But it is advisable to mail the coupon today, because this unusual no-risk offer is liable to be withdrawn any moment. Address DODD PUBLISHING COMPANY, 601 Broad St., Suite 1001, Newark, N. J.

Grandma Knows Musterole Is Best

Remember the time when you had that dreadful congestion of the lungs—and Grandma slapped a stinging, messy mustard plaster on your chest? How you writhed and tossed and begged Grandma to "take it off"?

That was many years ago. Now, Grandma gets the jar of Musterole, for now she knows Musterole is better than a mustard plaster.

She knows that it relieves colds, congestions, and rheumatic aches and pains.

And what is best, it relieves without discomfort or blister.

Musterole is a clean white ointment made of oil of mustard and other home simples.

Just rub it gently over the spot where there is congestion or pain. It penetrates down under the skin and generates a tingling, pleasant heat. Healing Nature does the rest. Congestions and pains both go away.

Peculiarly enough, Musterole feels delightfully cool a few moments after you have applied it.

Never be without a jar of Musterole.

Many doctors and nurses recommend it. 30c and 60c jars. $2.50 hospital size.

The Bowery Mission "Winners' Club"

"WHO are those men on the platform and in the front seats?" The question came from a visitor seated by my side at one of our nightly meetings.

"They are all our own men," I replied, "our converts, the products of our work."

"You don't mean to say," he said, "that any of these men were ever 'down and out'? I thought they were a delegation from some church. That gentleman over there, for instance, with white hair and mustache, I fancied he might be a Wall Street magnate—one of your patrons. Who is he?"

"Well," I replied, "he is from Wall Street, but he is not a millionaire. He is a porter or messenger in one of the great financial houses, and a very much trusted man. You will hear his story shortly.

And, accordingly, during the course of the meeting, James Norris arose, and in a steady and mellow voice told of the marvelous transformation that had taken place in his character and circumstances. It was a pitiful recital of a fall to the very lowest depths of degradation, of a soul struggle in the darkness of a godless existence, until the light broke in upon him in the Bowery Mission.

My visiting friend listened with eager attention, but the part of the address that seemed to thrill him most intensely, and gave him the answer to his question, was Norris's reference to the Winners' Club of the Mission.

It was this particular part of the Mission's work that had really led to the man's salvation.

The new-born babe requires careful nursing. The tender plant requires good soil, water, sunlight and attention. Under no circumstances is this so true as in the moral work of the Bowery. Norris was a homeless man. Don't ask why. It is too pathetic to investigate. But it was true. And a man of his peculiar type, in the beginnings of his Christian life, required just that very thing—a home. He found it in the Winners' Club.

The Bowery is a No-Man's Land. In it are thousands of men astray and homeless. The lodging houses are filled to overflowing. Men have a roof to cover them, and a bed to sleep in, but no home.

The Winners' Club comprises about thirty men; all we have accommodation for. They pay in advance a nominal sum for their board and lodging. They are continually in the atmosphere of spiritual companionship or engaged in wholesome recreations—they are never allowed to be lonely. Mr. A. C. Baker, secretary of the Mission, lives among them and is always ready to advise or comfort those who need him. They have comfortable beds, baths, sitting rooms, library, and other conveniences. But the greatest boon they possess is the opportunity for constant Christian activity. They are our regular workers, most of them being leaders, or associate leaders of the nightly meetings.

It was this mothering, fathering, brothering influence that saved James Norris. Nothing in Rescue Mission work is so absolutely essential as this department. If we had fifty Winners' Clubs in the Bowery they could all be kept busy, and would yield a tremendous harvest.

Christian Herald readers have for many years furnished the main support of the Bowery Mission. It is in a very special sense their work. All that it has accomplished has been made possible through their generosity. In making up our budget for the year just begun, we look confidently to them for a continuance of their friendly interest and generous support.

JOHN G. HALLIMOND.

On Christmas afternoon there was a concert. It was in French, mostly, that the folk sang and recited; but we who could scarcely follow their rapid words, could thrill to the message back of them. We could catch references to the new graves that even the gladness of the holiday season could not make green, and to the broken hearts that even the joy of Christmas could not heal. And we could applaud, in soul as well as with our clapping hands, when they sang our "Star Spangled Banner" and their own "Marseillaise." We could applaud, and we could go with them, after the concert, below decks and give fruit and candy to the steerage passengers.

IT WAS a quiet Christmas. There wasn't any special dinner and there wasn't any snow; there wasn't any Santa Claus for the children, or gifts for the grown-ups. It was a quiet Christmas—and a strange one. And yet, somehow, the real meaning of the day was there.

There wasn't any candle light, or any gorgeous tree,
The only thing, on every side, was miles of winter sea;
There weren't any flakes of snow upon the salty air,
You couldn't feel the slightest hint of Christmas anywhere.
And yet—at night, when all the world was wrapped in heavy sleep,
I stood on deck and watched the sea, and saw the high waves leap
Until they seemed to touch the sky, and,
glimmering afar,
I saw, reflected in the sea, the promise of a star.

We hadn't any stockings hung for presents, in a row,
We hadn't any holly wreaths, or any mistletoe;
The ocean was a sheet of green, half touched with foamy white,
That glittered with a magic spray of vivid rainbow light.
But somehow Christmas wasn't there, until I watched above
The steerage; Christmas wasn't there, until I saw the love
That flamed across a peasant's face, who softly sang, and smiled
Above a bundle, wrapped in shawls, that held her little child.

The deck steward has just told us that we will land tomorrow. Some people are laughing with joy and some are crying with happiness. And the little Frenchman with a sweetheart near the Spanish border is up in the wireless room sending a message. I am sitting in the writing-room copying this article on a typewriter that dances with the swaying of the ship. And I'm looking over my shoulder, every minute, and out of the window. . . .

For oh, friends of mine, land can't be very far away! And I don't want to miss the first glimpse of—FRANCE!

How the Kroonland Entertained

THE officers and crew of the U. S. S. Kroonland were hosts to fifty orphans from the Hammond Memorial Home and one hundred and twenty-five dependent children of Hoboken at a New Year's party and dinner on board ship. The children and their escorts were met at the gang-plank and directed to the "monkey deck," where they came under direct fire of a motion-picture operator. During the dinner the ship's band gave a program of popular music which many of the children joined in singing. Every sailor who could get hold of a kiddie had one under his wing and proceeded to give him the time of his life. Every kiddie received two small boxes of candy as a parting gift; and a New Year's card at dinner. It was a day of gray fog and mist on the river, but on the good ship Kroonland that beautiful spirit of the Master abode; "Inasmuch as they did it unto one of the least of these."

"Luscious Orange Juice"

The Overwhelming Verdict of Physicians

WE wanted to know — so we could tell you — what physicians think of the healthfulness of fruits. We asked four questions of doctors, and these are the results:

111 physicians of the 118 mentioned oranges as one of the raw fruits most often prescribed for patients; 53 of the 111 mentioned no other fruit but oranges.

107 mentioned oranges as one of the most beneficial fruits for children under three years of age; 93 of these physicians mentioned no other fruit but oranges.

91 said oranges are one of the best fruits for children from three to fifteen years of age; 50 of this number specified oranges without referring to other fruits.

83 recommended oranges for adults, 31 mentioning no other fruit.

Some Notable Comments

"Oranges (juice) form a valuable article in the dietary of the infant and child and one that is with difficulty replaced by any other food," said one.

Another replied, "I know of no other fruit that is so excellent for the human being from infancy to old age."

Another investigation shows that convalescents in hospitals eat two and one-half times as many oranges as the usual consumer. Thus you see how this golden fruit is esteemed by men who know the body's needs.

Oranges Plentiful Now

Now oranges are again plentiful — California having this year produced a crop of almost normal size. That means twice as many oranges as were shipped from California last year when a period of severe heat destroyed two-thirds of the crop. It is estimated that this year's California crop will total fourteen million boxes, so there will be enough for everyone everywhere — and at reasonable prices.

Quick, Convenient and Delicious

Oranges are served in a jiffy. And a more luscious salad, dessert, or breakfast dish never has been conceived.

Don't go a day without a fruit that brings so many benefits in such attractive form.

Send the coupon below for "Food Value of Oranges," a little booklet by Dr. J. H. Kellogg, head of the famous Battle Creek Sanitarium.

With French dressing oranges are both salad and dessert.

A fine breakfast dish—a delicious fruit.

A luscious, quick dessert is prepared in a jiffy with oranges cut up and sprinkled with coconut.

Thousands of thrifty families are doing this very thing every year. Mrs. Wm. Hunter of Arkansas, made a good many extra dollars last season from her Kellogg Strawberry Garden, besides fully supplying her family with delicious strawberries.

You can do equally as well. We'll show you how and help you. Just send a post card with your name and address and we will mail you our big FREE Strawberry Book that pictures in colors and fully describes these wonderful Kellogg Strawberry Gardens.

Our new book shows a Kellogg Garden that will meet the requirements of your family—large or small. Kellogg Gardens are composed exclusively of the world-famed

KELLOGG PEDIGREE STRAWBERRY PLANTS

These are the world's heaviest fruiting and most profitable strawberry plants. They often produce three quarts of fancy berries per plant in a single season.

No matter where you live, or what kind of soil you have, Kellogg Pedigree Strawberry Plants will give you big yields and big profits. Any soil or climate that will produce garden vegetables will grow these strawberries successfully.

Kellogg Strawberries are the largest, sweetest and most delicious strawberries grown—ideal for home use or market. Beginners and experienced growers realize big crops and big profits from Kellogg Pedigree Plants. Here is the proof:

"My Kellogg Pedigree Plants produce at the rate of more than two quarts per plant each season, and the berries sell readily at good prices." A. J. HARTUNG, Michigan.

"I picked 900 quarts of delicious berries from only 400 Kellogg Pedigree Plants. They were sent twenty-five miles to market by auto and sold for big money." G. W. MYERS, Iowa.

"From my Kellogg Strawberry Garden of only 250 plants, I picked 530 quarts of the most delicious strawberries this season. Had more than we could use and they sold readily at 25 cents per quart." FRANK COMSTOCK, Nebraska.

"Kellogg's Everbearers have gone beyond my highest expectations. They are wonderful. We had ripe strawberries right up until Thanksgiving."
J. A. THOMAS, Missouri.

GOLD STANDARD OF VALUES"

Reo Standing Is Secure

Consider any class of manufactured product and there will come to your mind instantly the names of one or two that stand out above all the rest.

The superiority of these has been so conclusively proven that their leadership is conceded alike by competitor and customer

Among automobiles Reo occupies that enviable position.

Reo quality is so outstanding, Reo reliability and low upkeep so universally known, salesmen seldom find it necessary to inform buyers on these points.

Questions most frequently answered pertain to deliveries—"How soon may I expect my Reo?"

This eminence among motor cars was not achieved easily, nor in a day.

Not even in a decade!

It is the result of a consistent adherence over a long period of years to a consistent policy.

And that policy was rock founded in the beginning.

We are proud of the position Reo enjoys.

It is the reward for which, more than any other, we have worked.

Reo has never been ambitious to make all the automobiles—only the best automobiles.

The policy from the first—and Reo is the pioneer in the industry—has been never to make more than we could make and make every Reo as good as the best Reo.

Reo demand—a demand that always has been in excess of the possible output of the big Lansing factories—is the result of that policy and our unswerving adherence thereto.

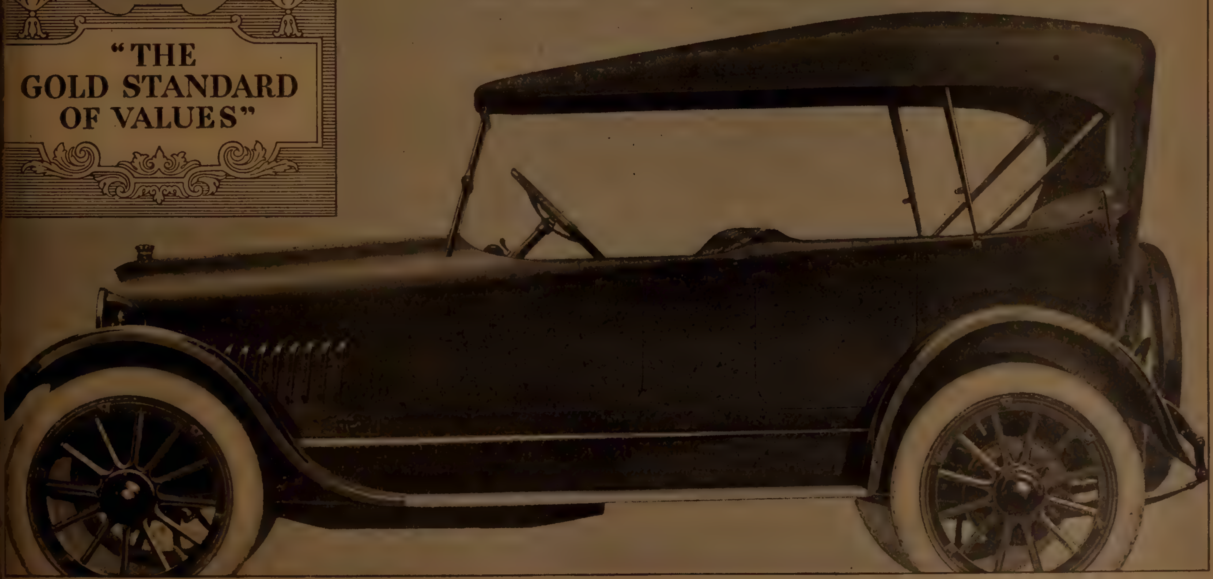
At this moment the demand is out of all proportion to the supply.

What will it be when the real spring buying season opens up?

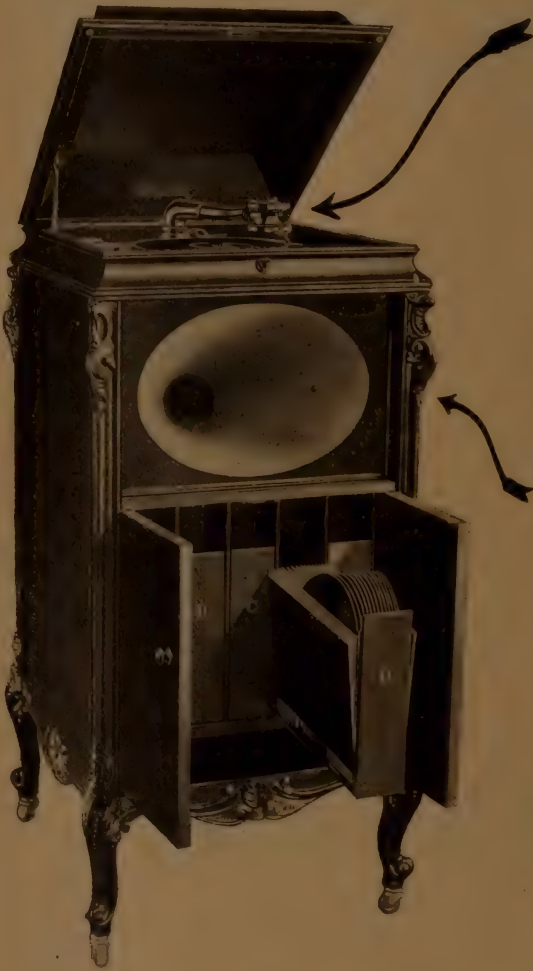
Only way to be at all certain of securing a Reo of any model for the coming season is—

See your Reo dealer—place your order—make it a bona fide order by paying a deposit—specify a definite date for delivery—and rest easy in the certainty that your next car will be a Reliable Reo.

Today—won't be a minute too soon.



Why the Brunswick Method of Reproduction Insures a Superior Phonograph



Reason No. 1 The Brunswick Method of Reproduction includes the Ultona, a new conception in playing. The Ultona consists of an arrangement of the several necessary reproducing diaphragms upon one tone arm. This is an all-in-one arrangement, with no attachments—nothing to take off or put on.

At a turn of the hand, the Ultona is adapted to play any type of record. The proper diaphragm is presented, the exact weight, the precise needle. Thus the requirements of each type of record are met.

So each record, whatever make, is played exactly as it should be. The Ultona demands no sacrifice in tone, as attachments often do.

The Brunswick owner can choose records without regard to make. Every singer, every band, every musician, every selection may now be played at its best on the one phonograph.

Reason No. 2 Equal in importance to reproduction is tone amplification. The Brunswick Method of Reproduction also includes a new idea in acoustics—The Brunswick Amplifier.

Old-time ideas were at variance. Some makers still cling to metal construction. Others use a combination of wood and metal—a wooden horn and a metal casting as the "throat."

But the Brunswick Amplifier is oval in shape, and built entirely of wood, like a fine violin. It is molded of rare holly-wood.

Sound waves require uniform amplification to reach their fullness. You will note that The Brunswick tone is richer and more natural. Strident, metallic notes are absent.

Make comparison. Let your ear decide. Try to find an equal to Brunswick tone.

You're bound to end such a search at a Brunswick Shop, where every opportunity will be given you to decide for yourself.

Hear this remarkable instrument before you decide. And you'll avoid regrets.

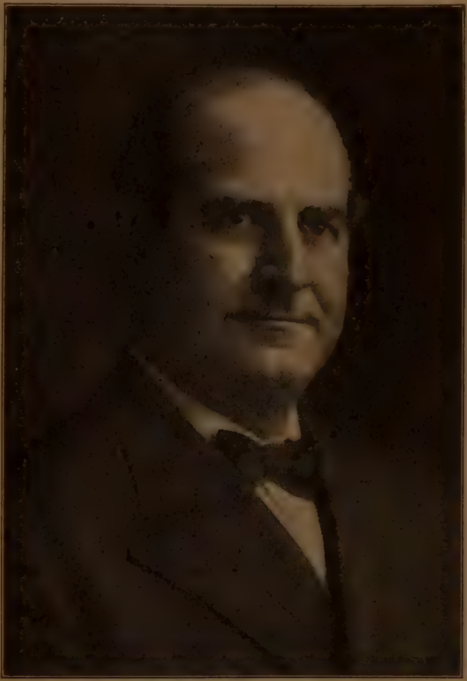
The Prohibition Victory

By Hon. WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN

Former United States Secretary of State and Life-Long Prohibitionist



HAS been a great fight and the victory complete. It cost years of toil and sac- ifice, millions of earnest men and women aving cheerfully contributed their part, e result is abundantly worth the effort. thirty-six states ratifying within thirteen s from the day the Amendment was sub- , with eight more states, though unneces- o ratification, already added to the list, he probability of three more before the tures now in session adjourn, and the nty that the entire forty-eight states will orded in the affirmative when the people states (if any) that fail to ratify this year another chance—what a glorious triumph nation's conscience!

may be worth while to review briefly the that have contributed to the final result. rst and most important of all is the moral ent that has been back of the Prohibi- ght. Because alcohol is a poison—injuri- body, mind and soul—the sale of it has indefensible before the bar of Conscience. responsibility for the wrong done by the who sells it to his neighbor rests primarily the individual who handles the product akes the profit, it does not rest upon him The co-responsibility of the voter has more and more clear as the harmful effect hol, even in moderate quantities, has been nstrated conclusively by scientific experi-old question, "Am I my brother's r?" has been used by the men engaged in usiness, and they could not have borrowed ter phrase, because it is as deceptive in its nt application as it was when used by He had not only failed to keep his er, but had actually taken his life; and so who have tried to avoid or shift responsi- by repeating the phrase have been guilty positive attack upon the welfare of those hom they sold. But the voter is not at y to stand by and see an injury committed it is within his power to prevent it. The en Rule is an essential part of the Christian on. It is not content with negative harmless- but compels affirmative helpfulness. The coer- upon the voter has been increased by these facts.

RST. The collecting of money from the saloon has given to each taxpayer a part in the blood- ey collected by the saloon because, to a certain nt, the license fees decrease taxes and put money his pocket. He is, therefore, compelled to ask elf, "Can I afford to vote money to myself at expense of the man who drinks? Can I stand for policy that auctions off the souls of men in return evenue derived from the traffic—especially when e revenues, by saving me money, go in part into own pocket?" Then, again, the submission of saloon question to the voter puts upon him the onsibility of throwing his influence one way or other. He can no longer shift responsibility; he t choose which he will serve, the home or the on.

cond. Scientific investigations have greatly aided cause of Prohibition. It has been established ond question that alcohol impairs efficiency. It ers the record of a man at target practice—he not shoot as straight. It increases the number mistakes that the typesetter will make—his time ot so valuable to himself or to his employer. It kens ability to resist disease and it shortens his ectancy as measured by insurance tables. Men ncreasing numbers have come to understand that cide by degrees is no more defensible than suicide sudden act. The man who, at a critical moment the progress of disease, must confess to his wife children that his chances of remaining with them have been decreased in order that he might indulge his appetite, finds it difficult to defend the subordination of the interests of his loved ones to a selfish gratification of a taste for liquor. The father who knows that the average expectancy of a moderate drinker is, at the age of twenty-one, less by more than ten per cent. than the expectancy of the total abstainer, is embarrassed when he comes within sight of the end and finds that through his indulgence in drink he must leave his children just at the time when they need him most and throw upon his wife a double care, especially if she has already suffered the privations which the drinking man usually brings upon his family.

GOD never made alcohol necessary for body, mind or soul.

He never made a human being strong enough to begin the use of alcohol and be sure that he would not become its victim.

There is no time between the cradle and the grave at which it is safe to begin the use of intoxicating liquor.

W. J. Bryan

Third. Business men have given increasing support to Prohibition in recent years because important tasks cannot be entrusted to men whose mental processes are paralyzed by alcohol. Railroad and steamship companies and other large employers of labor have been compelled to lay down rules that have powerfully stimulated total abstinence. Employers have found that no safety devices can protect a drunken man from accident to himself and to others, and they have turned to Prohibition as a partial protection against damage suits.

THESE three influences—an awakened conscience, scientific experiments and business experience—were bringing the nation inevitably to Prohibition. But the War hastened the overthrow of the saloon, because patriotism became an ally of the Prohibition forces. The strain which war brought upon the man compelled the nation to pay attention to the evil effects of alcohol. One hundred per cent. men were needed, and we could not afford to make a reduction in man-power for the benefit of a traffic which was so sordid and selfish that it would make drunkards of the very soldiers who must stand between us and a foreign foe. A law was passed prohibiting the sale of intoxicants to men in uniform, and to make this law more effective dry zones were created around cantonments. The benefit of these laws and regulations immediately became apparent and converted persons who had previously opposed Prohibition. It is admitted by practically all that the elimination of alcoholic drinks enabled our nation to mobilize its forces as it could not have done if it had been compelled to endure the waste and inefficiency produced by drink.

We had many slogans during the war. Among the most prominent were, "Food will Win the War" and "Bonds will Win the War." To these may be added "The Withdrawal of Intoxicants from the Soldiers Helped to Win the War," while the banishment of the saloon at home increased the capacity of producers on farm and in factory to furnish the food and ammunition necessary.

But now that the time for Constitutional Amendment is at hand, what of the future? We must not devote our entire time to rejoicing over victories achieved; we must press forward and take up the new duties—and there are some new duties to be performed in connection with Prohibition.

1. We must enforce the law. Laws are not self-enforceable. As long as it is profitable for a human being to violate the law, the law will be violated. A law that is never violated may almost be called an unnecessary law. The more a law is violated the more apparent its necessity. We have a law against murder; it is violated and, therefore, we must have officials who, having no sympathy with murder, will be ready to prosecute those who violate it. We have a law against stealing; it is violated and, therefore, we must have officers who have no sympathy with thieves in order to secure the enforcement of this law. And so there are laws on other subjects. The law is the voice of the community and the officer is the arm of the community, acting in sympathy with the voice.

THE believers in Prohibition must be on the alert to see to it that the enforcement of the law is not entrusted to those who are in sympathy with its violation. We have secured a great advantage in prohibiting the manufacture, as well as the sale, of beverage liquors, because we have overthrown the citadel of lawlessness. The brewers' associations and the distillers' associations have stood back of the violations of the law, and furnished the money to carry on the campaigns for the election of officials pledged in advance to lawlessness. While the manufacture of intoxicating beverages was permitted, these men could meet publicly and pass resolutions threatening politicians who dared to favor Prohibition, but their power to threaten is gone and the coercion is now on the other side. The very politicians who used to be afraid of offending the brewers will now be afraid of offending the sentiment that supports the law. The bootleggers cannot organize national or even state associations. They are as powerless as the pickpockets when it comes to organized action. There can be no concerted action among the violators of a law embodied in the National Constitution. But while our task is made easier it is still necessary to provide the machinery for enforcing the law and to be careful of selecting the officials who are to prosecute violators of the law.

2. We must continue the educational work in favor of total abstinence.

In its last analysis Prohibition must rest upon the conviction that alcohol is injurious, and this must be taught to each generation. It will be easier to teach this when drinking is no longer fashionable in politics, in business or in society. But the educational work must go on in order that each year may find the sentiment more and more nearly unanimous.

3. We must help the world outside. Christianity would not grow in the United States if our churches were not interested in missionary work. A man cannot enjoy religion without wanting to bring to others the knowledge of the blessings which he has received. And so, having abolished the saloon on the theory that total abstinence will be a blessing to our country, we cannot fully enjoy that blessing without desiring to communicate to others a knowledge of the benefits received. There must be complete enforcement of the law giving to our country the maximum good derivable from total abstinence, and we must not only send abroad those who can explain what Prohibition is in practice, but we must invite representatives from other countries to come here and see for themselves what has been wrought by the overthrow of the drinking-place.

PROHIBITION began in the rural districts and spread through the agricultural states before it became strong in the states containing the cities. But as Prohibition enforced vindicated itself, the sentiment spread until now it has become a national policy, and will ultimately become a world policy, because it rests upon principles that are universal in their application. The argument against drink applies to all who are now living; it applies to all who hav lived; it will apply to all who may be born he

1. God never made alcohol necessary for body, n soul.

2. He never made a human being strong eno begin the use of alcohol and be sure that he wo become its victim.

3. There is no time between the cradle and th at which it is safe to begin the intoxicating liquor.

If these propositions are true they are true everywhere—and i everywhere, there is the same for Prohibition in other lands there is here. But the Church lead this fight because, in addi the reasons which others hav Christian has obligations inse from his church relationship.

1. Having given himself in of service to God and to Chr had no moral right to take i body that which will impair th of the service pledged or to r formation of a habit which, formed, may destroy his disposi service as well as his capacity.

2. The Christian, no matte rich he is, has no money to spar intoxicating liquor when so n worthy causes need all the mone he has to spare. How can he go on his knees at morning and p his heavenly Father, "Thy Kin come," and then rise up and spe intoxicating liquor money tha might use to hasten the comin God's kingdom on earth?

Prohibition Proclaimed by Acting Secretary of State Polk

FOLLOWING is the text of the proclamation issued January 29, 1919, declaring the prohibition amendment adopted and a part of the nation's basic law.

"To All to Whom These Presents Shall Come, Greeting:

"Know ye that the Congress of the United States, at the second session, Sixty-fifth Congress, begun at Washington on the third day of December, in the year one thousand nine hundred and seventeen, passed a resolution in the words and figures following:

(Here the text of the Amendment was inserted.)

"And, further, that it appears from official documents on file in this department that the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed as aforesaid has been ratified by the Legislatures of the States of Alabama, Arizona, California, Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, South Carolina, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin and Wyoming.

"And further, that the States whose Legislatures have so ratified the said proposed amendment constitute three-fourths of the whole number of States in the United States.

"Now, therefore, be it known that I, Frank L. Polk, Acting Secretary of State of the United States, by virtue and in pursuance of Section 250 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, do hereby certify that the amendment aforesaid has become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States.

"In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Department of State to be affixed.

"Done at the City of Washington, this 29th day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and nineteen.

"(Signed) FRANK L. POLK,
"Acting Secretary of State."

Who Will Get the German Colonies?

GERMANY'S colonies must not be returned. This is the final agreement of the delegates of the nations at the Peace Conference in Paris. On January 26 this seemed to be the only point upon which all did agree. In addition to the secret treaty which brought Italy into the war and guaranteed her territory on the Adriatic contravening the principle of self-determination as applied to the Jugo-Slavs, another secret treaty appeared to balk the Conference. This treaty guaranteed to Japan the Caroline and Marshall Islands and assigned other German possessions in the Pacific to New Zealand and Australia.

President Wilson and the American delegation let it be known early in the week that they stood uncompromisingly for the placing of the German colonies under the general authority of the League of Nations, the administration of individual colonies to be entrusted by mandatories to that one of the Allies best fitted to exercise it. Australia and New Zealand were insistent upon the addition to their territories of the German islands conquered by their troops. The Japanese were said to be doing a great deal of listening and not much talking, but without withdrawing their claims.

Mr. Wilson was reported to have declared to the Conference that to divide the German colonies and the conquered territory of Turkey would be in direct contravention of the "fourteen points." He was also said to have declared against a peace of "loot." This was on Wednesday, and following this plain statement events moved more rapidly toward a complete agreement.

It was announced on January 30 that the whole subject of the German colonies had been discussed fully at that day's session of the Supreme Council, and that provisional arrangements had been perfected for the temporary government of Germany's possessions as well as of Turkey. The various colonies were to have the ultimate decision as to their governmental form and allegiance.

While the main conference was deciding the question of colonies, a commission of delegates was gathering material on the question of indemnity, and it was reported on January 30 that there would be no attempt made to collect from Germany any indemnity for war costs, but that she and her partners would be required to pay in full for all wanton and unjustifiable damage. The British claims it was said would be for damages done in air raids and through the sinking of merchant ships, Great Britain planning to take German ships in return for hers which had been sunk.

The Committee appointed to place the responsibility for the war and to bring to justice the high personages responsible, was reported to be making progress. The Ebert Government in Germany was thought to be favorable to an international investigation, and it was hoped that it would willingly make available the evidence in its possession.

ON FEBRUARY 1, an Associated Press correspondent at Paris reported that:

"The accord reached by the council of the great powers concerning the disposal of the German colonies and the occupied regions of Turkey in Asia is much more definite than was generally supposed. In addition to acceptance in principle of the American plan of mandatories, the plan embraces the following main features:

"The Allied and associated powers are agreed that the German colonies shall not be returned to Germany, owing, primarily, to mismanagement, cruelty, and the use of these colonies as submarine bases.

"The conquered regions of Armenia, Syria, Mesopotamia, Palestine, and Arabia are to be detached from the Turkish Empire.

"Provision is made whereby the well-being and development of backward colonial regions are regarded as the sacred trust of civilization, over which the League of Nations exercises supervisory care. The administration or tutelage of these regions would be intrusted to the more advanced nations, who would act as mandatories in behalf of the League of Nations.

"These mandatories would not be uniform, but vary according to the degree of development of the colonial region and its approach to the stage of self-government. The mandates in Palestine, Syria, and other portions of Turkey, where well-developed civilization exists, would be comparatively light and would permit of provisional recognition of the independence of these communities.

"On the other hand, colonies like those in Central Africa would require a mandatory with large powers of administration, responsible for the suppression of slave trade, liquor, ammunition and arms traffic. . . .

"Other colonies and localities, such as those in German Southwest Africa and some of the South Pacific Islands, have such sparse and scattered populations and are so separated from other communities that the laws of the mandatory country would probably prevail in these regions.

"The mandatories would report at stated intervals to the League of Nations concerning the manner in which a colony was being administered."

It was also announced, on February 1, that the United States, Great Britain and Italy had agreed upon the basic principles of the League of Nations, France acquiescing in most particulars, and that daily meetings of the council would be held, beginning February 3, until a complete agreement was reached. The tentative draft was said to include a prohibition against the use of submarines, a provision for use of combined economic pressure to discipli recalcitrant nation, with the use of force left opt with the individual members of the League and provision for the reduction of land and naval a ments. A proposal looking to the prohibition of c scription was said to be as yet unacceptable to It she being uncertain as to her ability to offer en pay to induce volunteering. It was also reported the permanent form of organization had not fully agreed upon.

MY FIRST glimpse of France was a dim flick- lights against orizon line, that grew up, cally, out of usk. I leaned st the rail and ned them, only knowing what stood for until ry old man up from be- me, in a voice trembled with ion.

'oilà," said the old man. "C'est ance!" And so w.

was the eve- of our four- h day at sea we were all ily tired of the The name of eaux, our land- lace, had come old, for us, all ure of a prom- land. And so, e very old man spoke, others took up the sen- until the ship seemed to ring with excited h, and folk came hurrying from every side.

s it Bordeaux?" one would question, and—s it really land?" another would breathe.

stood beside the rail, quite unable to speak. For ce lay before me, the France of song and story legend—the France of war and bravery and vic- . I stood there without speaking while the lights nearer and grew brighter.

Bordeaux"—it was a woman somewhere in the ground who spoke—"Bordeaux is on a river. It e lighthouse at the mouth of the river that you ow. We will go up the river tomorrow—yes! we will land at perhaps two o'clock."

nother woman took up the story.

The customs officials, they will be coming on board ," she laughed; "we must have our passports y, and our baggages—" here was a flutter of excitement along the deck—a t of laughter on one side, a sound of sighing on the r. And some folk hurried below in a mad flurry remature preparation. But I—I still leaned against rail and watched the lights that stood for nce.

might have been an hour later that the customs ials came out in their little boat to meet us. They rded the Chicago, and took up their headquarters e writing-room of the ship. It was only then that e myself away from the rail and went below to get passport. For in that hour I had seen the mouth e river take shape out of the dark, and I had seen e lights shining in back of the harbor lights. And d felt all the thrill that Columbus must have felt n he first glimpsed America.

he customs inspectors were orderly and pleasant. y were seated at long tables when we filed in with passports, and they gave us the most courteous of ntion and advice.

Why are you going to France?" they asked me n I presented my papers, and then, when I had wered them— "But—yes! And good luck to you, demoiselle!" And they had given me a bread et to present in the restaurants of Bordeaux and is. For food, in France, is not too plentiful, and must give a ticket for every bit of bread that he s.

t was ever so early the next morning that I was kened by a rap upon the door. We had anchored he mouth of the river the night before, and at about e o'clock in the morning we started up the river. e decks were crowded with the ocean-weary travel- , and I was among them. And we were all exclaim- , like delighted children, over commonplace things houses, and trees, and cows.

HE country around Bordeaux is the vineyard country. It is a level land, divided, here and there, by es set on either side with tall poplar trees; a land ted with pleasant farms and well-cultivated gar- -places. It looked almost like a toy landscape in e gigantic shop window. It scarcely seemed as if h a peaceful country could have known the suffer- and loss that all of France has known.

The people of Bordeaux were lined up on the dock aiting the arrival of our boat. There were soldiers all kinds on that dock—our own boys in khaki, ench poilus in their horizon blue, even Algerians, and Turcos in their baggy trousers. They cheered, a queer amalgamated cheer of all nations, as we swung alongside of the dock; cheered as we came staggeringly down the gangplank. And we, setting our feet again on dry land (only it wasn't dry, really, for all of France is damp and muddy in the winter time!), wanted to cheer, too.

As we left the dock and walked into the street we were greeted by a wild clamor, a series of shouts that came from a group of men who wore strange wooden shoes and blue denim smocks. They proved to be coachmen, for they beckoned us, with long whips, toward quaint two-wheeled wagons that stood at the side of the road. Some of the wagons were drawn by mules, others by oxen.

"Are we supposed to ride in them?" I gasped. For they looked ancient and unsteady.

The girl who spoke French laughed. "No," she told me, "they are only used to transport baggage. We only give them our trunks and valises to take to the railroad station."

I tried not to look too relieved. And I surrendered my baggage gladly. But I had one more question. "How will we get to the station?" I asked.

"We'll take a trolley-car," came the answer. A trolley-car! It sounded nearly civilized. But it wasn't. For the little trolley-car that ran in close to the wharf was a tiny affair built to accommodate perhaps fifteen people; and the conductor, a retired French soldier with one hand gone, blew on a conch shell when he wanted to start.

Bordeaux is typically a city of the sea, from its booted fishermen and its graceful sailing vessels to its shop windows, which are hung with oilskins and fish-nets. As the trolley-car took us through the narrow, muddy streets, I felt as a child, looking through a moldy book of old-world etchings, would feel. Only the etchings had come to life.

L'Arc de Triomphe

WITH captured German guns on every side,
The Arch of Triumph rises to the sun—
As if to call aloud to all the world
That France has conquered, that her work is done!
The guns are rusted now that once called out
Defiance to humanity and peace;
And every stain upon their iron sides
Speaks of a land in thrall—and its release!

The Arch of Triumph rises to the sky,
Serene and calm against the placid day;
And war seems all remote from it, a dream
Of horror that is very far away.
But oh, the captured guns on every side
Tell of a freedom that has had its birth
Anew, this year, in every Christian heart,
And of a victory that shook the earth!

Old women in shawls and aprons walked sturdily beside carts that were drawn by great dogs; old men leaned in doorways and smoked long, slender pipes. There weren't many young men about, but there were many little darting children—children who wore smocks and clattering wooden shoes and tight tam-o'-shanter caps. And, like real figures walking across the surface of a dream, I saw American soldiers everywhere, bronzed boys who whistled gay tunes, and smiled at the children, and gave them copper coins.

"So this is France," I found myself saying over and over; "this is France!"

The trolley rattled on past archways that showed the dark stain of many years, past marble statues growing triumphantly out of the mud, past public buildings that were decorated with splendid bits of carving and set beside hovels. And— "This is France!" I kept telling myself.

An American negro in the uniform of the regular army boarded the trolley-car. The French people stared at him with a wonder not unmixed with respect and nodded, half furtively, in his direction. To the French the American negro is an awe-inspiring personage. They smiled at him rather uncertainly when he laughed, with a white flash of teeth, at their obvious interest.

THE streets grew narrower. The houses, some of them, had red-tiled roofs and scarlet shutters. And a small boy, in a purple smock, leaned against a shop window and looked longingly, through the glass, at a basket of ripe oranges. The picture that he made was vivid—unreal.

And then the trolley stopped at the railroad station. And we got off. It was a large station, a station full of bustle and confusion; but, like the rest of Bordeaux, it was different from our world. It was arrange into queer alleyways, and there was a wide porch in front of it. We stood on the porch and waited for our baggage, a part of a madly gesticulating crowd.

It was a long while before the ox-cart with our baggage came into view around the corner of the last narrow little street. We paid the man and took it hurriedly into the checking-room of the station. And there we handed it over to a woman who took charge of the trunks—a strong woman with large capable hands and flashing black eyes. When I asked her, timidly, if I could leave my bags there until it was time for the train to Paris she poured forth at me a violent stream of words. I started back, but the girl who understood French laughed as she translated.

"She says," she told me, "that there isn't room for any more baggage. She says that you'll have to take it away again or wait until somebody calls for something. She says that she doesn't care which you do."

I waited. And presently an old Frenchwoman called for three shawl-wrapped packages and a parrot cage. But as I waited I thought of our own efficient, well-managed baggage rooms in our own modern, up-to-the-minute cities. So this is France! France! I shall never forget my first glimpse of it, and the photograph upon my brain will never fade out. It will always be a vivid memory to me, a picture of old men and women and little children, of gay colors and narrow streets, of marble carvings and mud, of varicolored uniforms, and dim shop windows, and tumbled baggage rooms. France!

I stepped out again to the station platform and paused there to get my direction. And as I stood, irresolute for the moment, I noticed four French soldiers standing together. They were laughing heartily over some joke, and it wasn't until they started to walk away that I noticed that each one of them wore an artificial leg, and that one of them carried an empty sleeve as well. But they were laughing—over a joke! And they walked away—still laughing——

Voilà. C'est la France!

History Unveiling Prophecy

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

I

IT IS astonishing how rapidly history is being made these days. Astonishing how the prophecy of the Old and New Testaments is finding fulfilment before our eyes. Life has a thrill in it as never before. Men are thinking today in the terms of revelation without knowing it. And their thinking is taking form in action which was predicted ages ago as coming to pass at this time.

A recent article in Harper's is a fresh illustration of this. It was penned by the distinguished Socialist John Spargo, and entitled "Russia and the World Problem of the Jew." I do not know whether he is a believer in the Bible or the God of the Bible. I do not know whether he is a student of prophecy; but he says so many things that are in harmony with the latter that he might almost be considered its interpreter. And yet he is speaking only from the historical and sociological viewpoint. That is the wonder of it.

For one thing, he believes that Russia's present political freedom, if it may be called so, is short-lived. He does not predict a reaction to Czarism, but he is convinced that Russia will pass into a monarchy of some sort before emerging into a strong and free republic. Advocate of social democracy as he is, and eager for its sway over all the earth, he does not believe that feudal absolutism can be transformed into its opposite without passing through other phases of national existence to which Russia is yet a stranger.

Compare this with what was said in these pages some months ago upon the theme, "What the Bible Teaches About Russia." We were interpreting prophecy and Mr. Spargo is interpreting history, but in broad outline the conclusions are the same.

II

THIS Socialistic authority agrees with the Bible in his opinion of the Jew and his religion. The Jew is not persecuted in Russia because of his religion, in his judgment, but because of the effects of his religion in his political and social life. And this, as he admits, reflects credit on the Jew and his religion.

The Jew, as he puts it, has never fitted into the economic life or feudal civilization of Russia, for the simple reason that he was never meant to be a slave. He does not explain why, but the Bible does, when it assures us that God has a mighty purpose in Israel. That purpose is to use her as an instrument in the redemption of the human race through Christ, inherent in which purpose is the bestowment of gifts upon her that make for liberty. The Jew has intelligence, imagination, courage, which are his heritage from Jehovah, and which go to "set him upon an eminence among all the peoples of the earth."

This eminence, which Mr. Spargo thus concedes, was predicted as long ago as Moses. "And it shall come to pass if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day, that the Lord thy God will set thee on high above all the nations of the earth. . . . And the Lord shall make thee the head and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath" (Deut. 28 : 1,13).

It is because Israel has not obeyed the voice of the Lord that this has not yet come to pass in her history, and yet the same prophet speaks of her repentance and obedience as something yet to come.

But this eminence, when it shall be brought to pass, does not mean absolutism. The Czarism of Russia or the Prussianism of Germany can never typify the reign of David's Son. Israel, even with a King reigning from sea to sea, will yet be essentially a democracy. Mr. Spargo speaks of the rôle which the Jew plays in the social revolutionary movements of modern times, and rightly traces it to the teachings and examples of the Old Testament prophets. Their burning denunciations of oppression and injustice, and their splendid visions of righteousness and social justice, teach us what the government of the earth will be when repentant and converted Israel comes into her own. In that day, the words of the psalmist shall be fulfilled: "O let the nations be glad and sing for joy; for thou shalt judge the people righteously and govern the nations upon earth."

III

MR. SPARGO touches prophecy at still another point. He is not with those who pooh-pooh the restoration of the Jew to Palestine. To quote his words, the argument for such "a Jewish state can not be ridiculed out of existence by telling the story of the Rothschild who said that he believed in a Jewish nation in Palestine, provided he could be its ambassador at the court of St. James."

It is commonly said that the Jew, especially the American Jew, does not wish to return to Palestine, but prefers to remain where he is. But Mr. Spargo meets the objection with the obvious reply that the argument for Polish independence does not rest on the willingness of the Poles in America to return to Poland. There are plenty of Poles for Poland, outside of the favored ones in America; and there are plenty of Jews for Palestine in the same sense. Twenty-five hundred years ago they did not care to return to Palestine from Babylon and other countries, whither they had been dispersed; but nevertheless enough of them returned to repopulate the whole territory, and, had it been in God's will, to reestablish a strong and independent nation.

Speaking only from the human standpoint, this writer says that the aspiration of the Jewish people for a return to the homeland has a basis that is more solid than any mere sentimental yearning for the continuation of their national history. It has the sanction of a great social law that is as old as civilization itself. "That law is that no people have been able to maintain themselves in equal estate with other men, unless they commanded a national organization whose statesmen could represent their interests in the councils of states and nations. No person can doubt for a moment that the persecution of the Jews in Russia and Rumania would have been impossible if, somewhere in the world, there was a Jewish nation whose ambassadors were present in the courts of all other nations."

IV

FINALLY we discover another point of con between this article in Harper's and the teach of the prophets, in what it says about the solutio the Jewish problem being as important to the Jew as to the Jew.

"To free the Jew from all inequality, discriminat and oppression is to free the Gentile world from of its gravest perils." That peril, as the article presses it, is the fact that so long as Israel is a peo without a country, wandering to and fro among nations, so long will continue the inability of the J to recognize responsibility for the maintenance of a nation in which he may be found.

The prophets do not express the blessing of a stored Israel on the Gentile world in the same way, they go much further. This is the language of Isai

"Arise, shine; for they light is come, and the gl of the Lord is risen upon thee. . . . And the Genti shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightn of thy rising" (Isa. 60 : 1, 3). And Paul adds, "N if the fall of them (the Jews) be the riches of the wor and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentil how much more their fulness? For if the casting aw of them be the reconciling of the world, what sh the receiving of them be but life from the dead (Rom. 11 : 12, 15.)

V

IF PERMITTED, we would speak of one mo current event which is unveiling prophecy, though it is not drawn from Mr. Spargo's article, b from that of Professor Lotz of the University Munich, in the Nord-Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitun the semi-official organ of the late government Germany. He is writing in favor of a League Nations, a purely European league, and one accep able to Germany, of course; but he significantly sa that it should maintain a powerful united army a navy, under the leadership of a small neutral stat Such a leadership he considers essential, because t hegemony of one of the great powers would lead jealousy on the part of others. The small state mig be Belgium, or Luxemburg, or Switzerland, or one the Balkans.

But the point is that the Bible speaks of just su a leadership in the age to come, only the small sta is not one of those named, but one as yet not even existence—Palestine, the nation of the Jew!

Thus it is written in Micah, "The law shall go for of Zion, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusale (Micah 4 : 2).

Isaiah is still plainer: "For the nation and th kingdom that shall not serve thee shall perish; ye those nations shall be utterly wasted" (Isa. 60 : 12

See also Zech. 14 : 16-19: "And it shall come to pa that every one that is left of all the nations whi came up against Jerusalem shall even go up from ye to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, an to keep the feast of tabernacles. And it shall be th whoso will not come up of all the families of the ear . . . even upon them shall be no rain. . . . Th shall be the punishment of Egypt and of all natio that come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles.

An Eminent Pastor Pleads for a League of Churches

I HAVE noted with much interest of late the discussions, editorially and otherwise, in the Christian Herald and in several leading denominational and secular magazines, on the subject of Church Union. May I dot down a few reflections of, I trust, some interest to those who are true High Churchmen, and of interest, indeed, to all those to whom the cause of Christian unity is of serious and sacred import? It is worth our while to contend for this bravely and lovingly. Silence and timidity seldom win any conquests.

The remarkable letter in a recent issue from the pen of Sir Hall Caine, in which he pleads for a "League of Churches for the protection of the world's faith," deserves and doubtless will have a wide and serious perusal. The vexed question of church union is knocking loudly at our door for settlement. These are days of getting together. There is church union everywhere at the front, and when the boys are back they will wonder what is the matter here at home. That most of the leaders, as well as the rank and file, in all the churches are openly confessing their faith in the essential unity of all true Christian people is to be hailed with delight and gratitude to God. It is but evidence of the spirit of catholicity that is abroad in our day, and this new-born impulse is strongly influencing all those who believe that in the march, the struggle, the victory of a glorified race, the Church of God will discover its purer and ideal self in a larger fellowship as it never can do in its manifold divisions.

True union is not impossible. It is to be hoped for, because the Lord of all desires it. It is to be prayed for, as he prayed for it. It is coming, and we think there are clear signs of it by the growth of mutual forbearance and mutual respect.

All who believe in our Lord and Saviour, so as to trust in him alone for eternal life, we are bound to consider as one in him, the Head of the body, the Church, and that Church, we feel assured, consists of all such, however they may differ as to the mere scaffolding of Christianity—non-essential doctrines, church polity, etc. There is a narrow-minded bigotry which would limit Holy Church within its own enclosure and forms. I think, Mr. Editor, all such narrowness is against good neighborhood, against charity, and against the truth and grace of God's blessed Gospel. That Gospel tells us over and over again that all who believe are saved, and if so they must be in the one Church of the saved. For my own part, I should be happy, not merely to meet for divine service with any church of the same faith and order, but with all churches of Christ which hold the great doctrines of the Gospel, however we may differ as to government and forms of worship. About these things the best of people on all sides may differ as to judgment and as to taste; but in the great fundamental principles of divine revelation we are agreed, and in the love and service and favor of the same Master we are one, for ever one.

I wish that all Protestants could see this, feel it, and act upon it, and resolve, as we think they ought, to make a mutual effort and advance toward visible union. A rapidly growing number are strongly convinced that all the churches which are doctrinally one should endeavor to be visibly one, and by mutual conce sion melt into unit before the ey of the world. I impossible? Are we so stiff, or so col or so conceited of our own near neigh borhood to perfection as to reject th thought as unwelcome or visionary Let us hope not. Why cannot eac denomination surrender a little, whe conscience need not prevent, "to plea his neighbor to edification?" Surely w may abandon a preference withou sacrificing a principle. If we will no see this, and prefer to continue i "doubtful disputations," then the re union of Protestantism is a long wa off, and Christian charity has lost he throne in the heart.

The hour has struck. The Church o Christ stands at the parting of the ways Her next step must be forward o backward. The thinking Christia public are watching for the outcome and the eyes of the whole world ar turned upon the Church. Is she goin to decline the joy and honor of openin up a new and glorious chapter i Christian history? If such shall som day be the triumph of Christian love happy will be the eyes that see it.

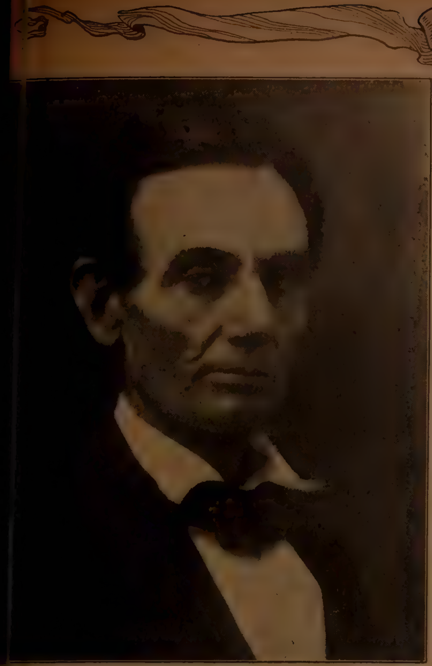
FROM LINCOLN TO WILSON

The Progress of Freedom

By CHARLES GRANT MILLER



Abraham Lincoln

Woodrow Wilson

WASHINGTON taught the world to know us; Lincoln taught us to know ourselves; Wilson is teaching us to know the world. These three figures stand out colossal in history for the simple reason that each in his time y sensed the heart ideals and purposes of our peo- and fitted these into practice.

You can see," said President Wilson in his great ce Conference speech proposing the League of ions, "that the representatives of the United tes are never put to the embarrassment of choosing ay of expediency, because they have laid down re them the unalterable lines of principles."

herein is exposed the secret of real power—if it r was a secret. That man is great and masterful meets a situation with the true principles of his ple. It was Washington's way when he wrought the colonists the liberty they sought. It was Lin- n's way in securing to the people the equality and on they fought for. It is Wilson's way, and he de this clear as light when he said in that same ech, speaking of our soldiers abroad: "They came Crusaders, not merely to win a war, but to win a se. And I am responsible to them, for it falls to me formulate the purpose for which I asked them to nt, and I, like them, must be a Crusader for these ngs, whatever it costs and whatever it may be essary to do in honor to accomplish the object for ich they fought."

No higher, clearer, truer expression and demonstra- n of real Democracy in action has been ever given the world.

HEY who are fond of contrasting President Wilson's "peace without victory" utterance with his er one of "force, force without limit," should bear mind that President Lincoln too was accused, and stly so, of inconsistency as great. The great leader a complex cause has no easy task in finding himself d his people. Lincoln, almost up to the end of the ivil War, was hotly charged by his opponents with ing an Abolitionist and the charge was as hotly denied by his friends. We are not at a loss to get at the fact and the reason for it. Descended from the poor whites of a slave state, Lincoln inherited through many generations the contempt if not the hatred held by that class for the negro. A self-made man, with scarcely one winter's schooling from books, his strong nature was built on what he inherited, and he could no more feel sympathy for the wretched slaves than he could for the horse he worked. He knew and saw clearly that the people of the free states had not only no sympathy with the abolition of slavery, but held fanatics, as the Abolitionists were called, in utter abhorrence. The unrequited toil of the slave was profitable to the North as well as to the South. With our keener business instincts we of the free states utilized the brutal work of the masters. We accumulated what they made without saving. So the question was complicated, and the Abolitionist was hated, hunted and imprisoned under the shadow of Bunker Hill Monument as keenly as he was tracked by bloodhounds at the South.

Only a keen knowledge of human nature in a jury made Lincoln at last master of the complicated situation when he came to mold into action the stirred impulses of the people. That he could await the forming of that national impulse and then truly sense it and put it into effect is no reflection upon, but highest proof of, his truly democratic leadership. Through such leadership alone could the people have asserted and secured "government of the people, by the people and for the people," in fact as in phrase.

IN LINCOLN'S section of Illinois the East met the South on common grounds. The flow of immigration from Massachusetts and New York intermingled with the flow from Virginia and Kentucky. Lincoln himself was more Southern than Northern, but his associates were representative of both sections and of both sentiments. In those days in that section it would have to be a very small group indeed that was not radically divided in opinion between slavery and anti-slavery. Freedom of speech was enjoyed in the fullest sense. Lincoln was an omnivorous reader, and his judicial mind absorbed the best there was in all shades of opinion.

WASHINGTON taught the world to know us; Lincoln taught us to know ourselves; Wilson is teaching us to know the world.

Thus Lincoln became an American and a nationalist, rather than a sectionalist. His mind spanned the opposing differences and envisaged both sections. He fought continually against sectional selfishness and sectional prejudice. Even at the height of the war he knew no sectional rancor. At its end he was the first to extend the hand of fraternity. It is said that the happiest day in his eventful life was when he visited Richmond at the close of the war and was warmly welcomed in the capitol of the Confederacy. Throughout the entire Civil War Lincoln held the highest opinion of Jefferson Davis, president of the Confederacy. He regarded him as a mistaken patriot. And that feeling was appreciated by Davis. When the war was over and Davis was visiting England, being fêted by the nobility there, and a high nobleman was expressing sympathy for Davis so fervently as to amount to a slur upon the United States, Davis courteously checked him, saying: "My lord, I was very unkindly treated by the government of the United States; but, sir, that country is my country, and it is the best country in the world."

Both Lincoln and Davis knew how to end war without hatred as well as they knew how to wage it without quarter. There was here the same spirit of "force, force without limit" proclaimed by Wilson, and also his same spirit of conciliation and justice and reunion at the war's close. Had Lincoln lived, no doubt the North as well as the South would have been spared much of the continued hate and many of the unspeakable miseries of a bungling reconstruction.

LINCOLN lived to see the nation unified on the basis of human equality. And that basis, firmly secured and demonstrated for half a century, forms the safe foundation of President Wilson's appeal for justice and equality for all peoples. Redolent indeed of the spirit of Lincoln are these words of Wilson uttered before all the world:

"Gentlemen, the select classes of mankind are no longer the governors of mankind. The fortunes of mankind are now in the hands of the plain people of the world. Satisfy them, and you have justified their confidence not only, but have established peace. Fail to satisfy them, and no arrangement that you can make will either set up or steady the peace of the world."

From the Lincoln declaration of equality to the formation of the League of Nations on this basis a more tremendous stride has been made in human freedom in the short span of a half-century than in all the centuries that had gone before.

President Wilson Visits Rheims

NO ONE can put into words the impressions I have received among such scenes desolation and ruin." Thus Mr. ilson expressed his feeling after a trip on January 3 from Paris to Rheims, through the territory ravaged by the carnage of war.

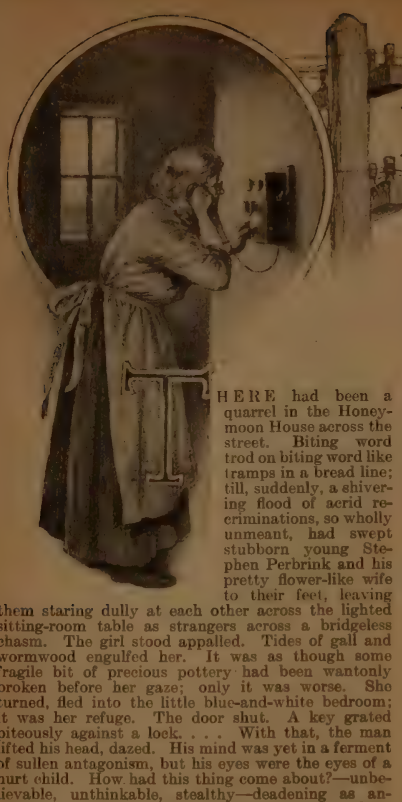
Mr. and Mrs. Wilson and a small party left their aris residence early Sunday morning, foregoing hurch attendance and the rest which Mr. Wilson felt e needed to perform what he considered a sacred uty. They went by motor to Château-Thierry, here they had lunch, after which they proceeded by otor to Rheims, passing through ruined villages nd along the old fighting lines.

Leaving Château-Thierry the party went through Belleau Wood, renamed by the French to mark the victory there of the American marines. The cars turned off the main roads and went through the narrow lanes and paths of the woods so that the President might see the actual ground across which American marines drove back the Prussian Guard. Farmers were already trying to reclaim the shell-cratered fields. At one point the President dismounted from his motor and stood beside the graves of 100 or more American boys who had given their lives to stop the drive on Paris and to keep back the Hun. Mr. Wilson drove up the hill between Belleau Wood and Château-Thierry, on which the American troops shattered the Prussian divisions which had been sent forward to crush the Yankee "greenhorns."

The President found Rheims a deserted city, less than 5,000 people now occupying what had once been the home of 115,000. A light blanket of snow covered the cathedral and touched with its beauty the misery and desolation of destruction. Standing in the interior of the cathedral nave, the President looked through the roof at the clouded sky. Before him the flagstones, worn with the feet of worshippers for more than 400 years, were covered with fragments of frescos, statues, columns and sculpture. Mr. Wilson viewed silently the destruction wrought upon this masterpiece by German ruthlessness.

EMPTY SPACES

A Short Story By Ruth Fargo



THERE had been a quarrel in the Honeymoon House across the street. Biting word trod on biting word like tramps in a bread line; till, suddenly, a shivering flood of acrid recriminations, so wholly unmeant, had swept stubborn young Stephen Perbrink and his pretty flower-like wife to their feet, leaving them staring dully at each other across the lighted sitting-room table as strangers across a bridgeless chasm. The girl stood appalled. Tides of gall and wormwood engulfed her. It was as though some fragile bit of precious pottery had been wantonly broken before her gaze; only it was worse. She turned, fled into the little blue-and-white bedroom; it was her refuge. The door shut. A key grated piteously against a lock. . . . With that, the man lifted his head, dazed. His mind was yet in a ferment of sullen antagonism, but his eyes were the eyes of a hurt child. How had this thing come about?—unbelievable, unthinkable, stealthy—deadening as anesthesia! And yet— With a hopeless groan of sheer misery Stephen Perbrink flung into his overcoat, out into the night. . . .

Somewhere a gate clicked viciously.

Pa Hollister, stocking-footed before the snapping fire in his own cozy brick fireplace, heard it and stirred uneasily. He sent a scuttling glance toward Mommie, placidly piecing nine-patch at the other end of the hearth.

"Trouble a-brewin' over yon'," acclaimed Pa shortly.

He hunched a shoulder in the direction of the gate that had slammed, the little green gate in front of the Honeymoon House. Honeymoon House!—so the curious, affable folk of Fairview had dubbed it a year since, when big, likable, happy-go-lucky Stephen Perbrink had brought home his bride; so they still termed it.

"Trouble—?" A little worry-wrinkle went crinkling across Mommie's brow.

"Steve's mooney of late." Pa spoke with certain acerbity. "His mind ain't on things it ought t' be on. He ain't doin' good to the store."

"But what's Stevie done—or ain't done?" Mommie regarded Pa intently.

"Both; done and ain't done," grimly. "Makin' fool mistakes, losing money an' trade. Givin' folks soap when it's soda they wants, an' beeswax when it's shoe-blackin', an'—" The voice of the elderly man broke with vexation. "Steve's that absent o' late he don't know if he's afoot or a-horseback!"

"My! Gracious!" breathed Mommie solicitously.

"Jes' so," answered Pa trenchantly. Then, "Count o' her, I p'sume."

He jerked an expressive thumb in the direction of the Honeymoon House, the house behind the offending gate; and forthwith thrust a poker into the very midst of the heavy coals with so vibrant a stroke that a very lather of tawny sparks scattered leaping and crowding threateningly up the broad black throat of the chimney.

"Best not set th' house afire," cautioned Mommie prudently. "The moss ain't all scraped off'n the kitchen ell roof yet, you 'member." Then, after a pregnant moment, "Couldn't you speak t' Stevie?"

"Humph," said Pa.

"Stevie likes you. He'd listen to you, Pa," urged Mommie.

"Talkin' to Steve wouldn't do no good," objected Pa. "It's her." Again he disturbed the nebulous glow in the old brick fireplace. Then he coughed. "I had it figgered out, Mommie, as you'd talk to Alice." Pa shifted a bit sheepishly in his chair.

"Talk to Alice!"

The eyes of the plump, elderly woman encompassed her life partner with a startled expression. Reproof dwelt in their dilated depths.

"For the land sakes, Pa!"

Pa grinned. "You won't min' talkin' to Alice, Mommie," he soothed. "Alice is jest one o' them uppity little-girl wimmen as don't know how to make a home for a man. She's makin' a mess o' her married life, her'n and Steve's. She needs her ma. She ought to be talked to," finished Pa blandly.

"I never was one to butt into other folks's business," adjured Mommie dismally. "I ain't aching to begin now, not at my age."

"Oh, you won't mind, Mommie," reiterated Pa cheerfully. He leaned back comfortable in his big armchair, the burden suddenly slid from his own shoulders. Mommie, he knew, would manage, somehow. She always did. Mommie could always fix things. She would fix things now, between Alice and Steve, so they would live happily ever after—and so Steve would be good for something at the store. Composedly, Pa put on his spec's, picked up his paper and settled to absorption

Half-provoked, half-amused, wholly maternal, Mommie surveyed him, the faint pink in her faded cheeks deepening ever so little like a far-away flush of dawn. She sighed, ever so softly:

"Pa does beat all! I reckon there ain't nothin' he don't think I can do."

Very deliberately Mommie tried to crowd down the dismay that so suddenly dehisced at her heart: She didn't like the job. But she knew that Pa was half right. She couldn't sit still in her chimney-corner and do nothing when just across the street the lives of two young folks, who hadn't learned to paddle the marriage boat, were in jeopardy. Alice's folks lived far away. Stevie's folks were noways near. There was nobody but Mommie. Oh, dear—! Again she sighed. But very valiantly she plied the short, stubby needle, stitch-stitch-stitch, while a little worry-look went trekking down between her brows and flatted out like lily pads over the deep pools of her eyes. Talking to Alice wasn't as easy as it looked to Pa.

"Min—?" Mommie's lips moved mutely. "Mind! I mind like tunket, jes' so!" Unexpectedly her mouth puckered up as though she had nibbled into a persimmon. She began snipping off little blue calico squares with exact precision. "See here," she softly apostrophized; "you jes' can't go a-snooping into Alice Perbrink's house a-scoldin' her for suthin' as mebbe she ain't ever done. That settles that!"

By way of emphasis the big shears slipped clatteringly to the red-brick hearth. The big tawny cat got up and stretched, turned round on her cushion and curled up for another nap.

But Mommie's mind, all evening, would go vagabonding back to the house across the street. What could she do? What could she do?—Pa, conscience-easy, read on.

Nine o'clock! The tall timepiece in the corner ding-donged its reverbations through the room.

"I jes' wisht—" absently intoned Mommie.

"What say?" yawned Pa, putting away his paper.

"Oh, nothin'," exasperatedly. "I was jes' a-thinkin'. Go on to bed."

Ten o'clock! . . . Pa snored peacefully. But Mommie heard all the minutes mumble past.

Eleven! . . . Twelve! . . . Somewhere a young rooster wakened and essayed a hectic crow.

One! . . . Two! . . . How loud a striking clock sounds at night!. . .

"Oh, dear!" sighed Mommie with the patient tiredness of patient age. "I wisht I'd never heard of Alice Perbrink!"

And all through the lagging hours of the next forenoon the wish stayed with her; but along with it like some moonshiny shadow tick-tocked another thought: "Don't dis-appoint Pa! Don't dis-appoint Pa! Don't dis-appoint Pa!" . . .

Mid-afternoon. The provocative hours dragged as though drugged. Distractedly Mommie sighed. Desperately she glanced across at the Honeymoon House; depressedly she pushed aside her mending.

"I might step by, jes' a minnit," she capitulated meekly. "But I ain't goin' to say a word to Alice Perbrink," she added belligerently, "not a word!"

But with that a screen door chirped its warning creak, and a voice, so girlishly young, called through the room: "It's just me, Mrs. Hollister." The disturber of Mommie's peace halted at the threshold.

"Why, Alice dear! come right in!" beamed Mommie. "I was just a-thinkin' of you."

The heart of the older woman ran instantly to greet her guest. From the pale gold fluff of the dimpling girl-wife's daintily coifed head to the toes of her silly little high-heeled shoes, Mommie's glance encompassed her. And loved her. Suppose it were Lucy, Mommie's own married daughter; she would want neighbors to be good to Lucy.

"Pa don't know it all y she mutely defended. s'pect Stevie's a good bi blame, too. Men-folks o are."

But aloud, twisting thread round the shank button, "I ain't seen St this two-three day," she mented. "I us'ly see a-comin' home to lunch."

"He don't come home-lunch—now," came the answ carefully casual.

"Don't come! Why, ain't a five-block walk."

Mommie's protest was as spontaneous as rain April. Fairview men-folk always walked home lunch.

Silently the rose-red lips of the girl-wife harde into a firm little line. Coolly, with exaggerated curacy, she built perky little stitches into a bit embroidery.

"Stevie rather eat—down-town," she voluntee icily.

Like a smother of soft snow a little silence spr through the room. Mommie was thinking, thinki thinking! What could she say? What could she s

But it was Alice who spoke first, silkily: "Our tas are so—different." And then, passionately, "So bearably different!"

"Oh," accepted Mommie.

"About lunch, and—and everything!"

"Oh," intoned Mommie again, very understa ingly, a reminiscent flicker twinkling into her eyes l the lighting of a candle in a dusk-gray room. "So v Pa's an' mine," she said. "I rec'lect as if 'twas ye day. Specially about string-beans. Pa wanted hi with cream het over 'em. I wanted mine cooked i iron kettle with a bit o' pork; my folks et 'em You've no idee what a sight different they be, the t ways."

Mommie paused, stared unseeingly through the w dow, absently slipping her thimble on and off. Th she giggled softly like a school-girl.

"M! what a time I had a-learnin' to eat 'em with l cream," she said.

"You don't mean you—gave up—like that?" p tested the girl-wife in a panicky whisper.

Mommie nodded.

"Oh," gulpingly—a smother of petted bitterne oozed through her words like whey through chee cloth—"I can't imagine you, Mrs. Hollister, being weak-kneed—like that!"

"I wouldn't call it jes' so. Not exactly." The ol woman's tone was as mild as the sprinkle of a m summer shower.

"But you gave up?" stonily.

"Child, I don't know when's the day I've cook pork with string-beans," affirmed Mommie w motherly patience. "I cal'late it's been years."

"You—you——?"

"I eat 'em as I cook 'em," firmly. Then: "La land, Alice dear! Tastes ain't anything set an' fix like the north star, or the church one's born to, or—

"But I won't do that," interrupted the girl-w wildly. "I won't." The words hurtled out in a hal fury. "I have a perfectly good right to my o tastes—my very, very own tastes—my very, very o individuality—my—O-h!" Aching outrage like tingling electric spark crackled across the half-chok pause. "I won't make myself over for any man!"

"My dear! Oh, my dear!"

"I won't. It breeds selfishness," scourged the you voice, "and tyranny. Men have already enough both—enough of both!" White teeth set on a quiv ing lip. "You can't deny it, Mommie Hollister. N woman can deny it—and tell the truth."

"There, there, there!" clucked Mommie, anxious a mother hen coaxing a cheeping chick under her win "there, there." Then, sagely, "Somebody's got to some givin' up."

"I'll go halfway, not—an—iota—more."

The little girl-wife's cameo-cut face was china-pla white; her meadowy bluet eyes were diamond-dy black except for a little rim of blue that scarce showed around the edge.

"Half—way," meditated Mommie softly. "It's ticklish spot t' find. Many's the time I'd a deal ruth a-hunted for a needle in a haystack."

But mutely Mommie brooded: "It ain't lunch, a it ain't tastes, an' it ain't jes' givin' up as is a-botheri of Alice—all them is jes' froth top o'the bucket. Th hurt's down under. An' Stevie's his share to blam But Alice must start things going right; wimmin-fol has that to do, same's baking an' sewing an' men ing——"

But the girl-wife's voice, brittle as mica, interp lated: "I'm not going to endure it any longer, thin as they are—not any longer. I'm going away. I going away—my trunk's all packed."

Mommie listened, patient, her needle steadily bu poignant thoughts thundering away at her brain: Sh must do something! She must do something!

"I'm going away," reiterated the girl-wife wi lack-luster ultimatum like a died-down flame. "I' thought it all over. And over. And over. . . . Th is the best—to go away—quietly. Back to my gi hood—freedom."

"You can't," contested Mommie stubborn ir freedom won't be there when you get to it. l be a dual body. Sometimes you'll be Stevie's and sometimes you'll be jes' little girl, and——" interruptingly precipitous as a shooting star the rife flung out her hands in acrid abandon. Her less laughter spilled in a wail of truculent bitss.

tevie's wife!" her lips scorned. "Wifehood—iage—small compensation for my girlhood free . . . Yet it promised," the words raced indinately on, "it promised one blissful soirée of osia and nectar! . . ."

liberately Mommie folded her mending and ped it in the basket, her needle threading the ies. She sat gently rubbing her thimble-finger the thumb of the other hand, her eyes tenderly ghtful.

don't know much about them foods," she deprel, "but they don't sound real relishable." Mom paused. Then: "Prob'ly you mistook that use. Prob'ly it meant good bread an' butter—iage is that-a-way, like good bread an' butter. n nothing can be more satisfying than jes' that—bread an' butter——" siduously the older woman wiped her glasses on orner of her spotless apron.

f it's made right," enigmatically.

e little girl-wife stirred restively.

Bread or marriage, marriage or bread, it's all the ," coached the motherly voice, "you've got t' see e makin' an' the bakin', or they don't either on turn out to your liking. An' both on 'em is home ol."

t Alice shook her head. "My trunk's all packed," said.

But your freedom ain't waiting," counseled Mom "You're Stevie's wife. You can't go back and care-free girl again. You can't undo what you've . Why, take that pretty blue-sprigged dress ve got on. S'pos'n you get sick on it. Can you t up an' put it back on the store-shelf and get the -sprigged piece instead? . . . Life's like that, l; don't spoil what you have, and get nothing but ndle of scraps in the end."

t Stevie's wife rose wearily, her senses sodden self-pity. "It's no use, Mommie—my mind's e up. And my trunk's—all—packed."

he heart of the older woman sank. What more d she say? What more could she say? . . . And the telephone rang!

Wait a minit, Alice, till I see who 'tis," said mmie calmly. "I want to give you that pansy seed your Aunt Cassie afore you go." Mommie was ring for time.

ut the young wife stared through the window, ess, scarcely heeding when her hostess returned, aining:

It was only Mis' Miller wantin' to borrow a yeast tin'. I'll run right over, jes' next door, and be k'n a jiffy. She—she's got her hands'n the dough," daciously added Mommie.

bright red spot glowed in either of Mommie's ks. If Alice had been noticing she might have dered, but the little girl-wife was far too miserable otice anything. She sat looking idly through the s; Mommie might have been gone a minute, or an r, it did not matter. Nothing mattered—now.

own the back walk sped the older woman. "I—I ught that yeast startin' right over, Mis' Miller," panted, bursting into her neighbor's kitchen. es, I knew I didn't need to, but I—I wanted to use r phone. I—I've got comp'ny."

Irs. Miller nodded understandingly. "'Tain't allus want comp'ny to hear what we're phonin'," she l. "Go right out'n the hall, Mis' Hollister, the ne's there."

oftly Mommie called: "4-2-6-J. Yes, yes; 4-2-6- . . . And if some one had been listening—nobody was!—some one might have known that 4-2-6-J was not a home call at all. It was the number of an institution. And if some one had been watching Mommie—nobody was!—some one might have mentioned that she looked very much like a naughty girl bent on stealing jam off the top cupboard shelf! . . .

Up the back walk sped the older woman. Pantingly she announced: "I 'member now, Alice, that pansy seed's som'ers up attic. If you don't mind we'll go right up'n look."

Once in the attic, which really did not look so much like an attic as a grown-up playhouse, there was much to see. . . . And there was the big iron-bound chest. It held the treasures of generations. . . . And Mommie must sprinkle fresh whole cloves through it to keep out the moths! . . . And, "These are my great-grandmother's gold beads; and this is my grandmother's old-fashioned snuffbox; and this is my mother's wedding bonnet—see, Alice, they don't make flowers like that these days, or ribbon half so wearable. . . . And here are Lucy's little baby dresses—I couldn't bear to give 'em away, not all on 'em."

Mommie's touch was very tender as she folded and unfolded the little garments—and the stress had gone out of the face of Stevie's wife; she had quite forgotten that her trunk was—already—packed! One pretty white hand groped among the treasures. "There aren't any baby dresses left to put away in our family," she laughed; "ten of us!—think of it? But, oh, what good times we had! Big families are best."

A wistful smile crept about the lips of the little girl-wife. In fancy she was back among her folks—brothers and sisters—romping down the old pasture lane! . . . But Mommie was merely making talk—listening, listening, listening—till, presently, the soft purring of a smooth-running car sent a little tremble through her plump, motherly form. And then the purring seemed to pause for ever so short a time, just under the giant willow that wept so dolorously over the Honeymoon House. . . .

That night, in two homes of Fairview, supper was late. Stevie's wife sped home with a little tinkle of laughter—of course, her trunk was already packed, but she didn't need to think of it just then! It was more pleasant to yield to the spell cast by that attic afternoon. . . . And Mommie, rattling stove lids, cast a hurried glance at the clock just as Pa turned in at the gate.

"See Alice?" sputtered Pa as he washed at the kitchen sink.

"Yes—yes," hurried Mommie, creaming salt pork.

"I s'pose you spoke?" urged Pa affably.

"Yes, I spoke," grimly; "all I'm goin' to. If there's any more speakin' t' do you can jes' go to Steve. An' that's all I've got t' say," scoldingly.

Pa chuckled. He hung up the towel, and took his paper out on the porch. He was quite content: Mommie had tackled the problem at the Honeymoon House, and Mommie would do something. She always did. And she never did things by halves! (They could still count on Steve at the store.)

Next morning came swiftly. "Pa Hollister," called Mommie, "run over t' the Honeymoon House an' borrow a cup o' buttermilk for batter cakes"—and all the time a jug of buttermilk stood on the drain-board! Had Mommie forgotten?

But Pa went, coming back without the buttermilk. But no matter: the batter cakes were all stirred for the baking, though Mommie had taken time to peep through the window a dozen times, worriedly asserting, "I had to do something—I jes' had to do something! Speakin' wan't enough."

Presently Pa came back. . . . "Don't stand there grinning like a Cheshire cat!" fumed Mommie.

"Now what d' you think?" chortled Pa.

Mommie waited.

"Tickled as a couple o' kids over a Christmas stocking!"

The elderly man shook his head, chuckling pleasantly, while a couple of anxious lines that had trekked in between his wife's eyes smoothed out as by magic. She began dropping batter on the hot greased griddle. . . . And then it dawned suddenly on the absent-minded messenger that he had forgotten the buttermilk—the buttermilk to make those same batter cakes!

"Why—why, Mommie!"—puzzled. "I plumb forgot to get what I went after." Suspiciously he eyed the sizzling griddle.

"Um-m-m—" Busily Mommie plied the smooth pliant paddle; up turned perfectly browned hot-cake faces, appetizingly fragrant. Mrs. Hollister was a deft cook. But even while she gave heed to her baking she was guiltily conscious of her husband's suspiciously accusing gaze, transferred from the hot-cake griddle to her.

"Well—why don't you tell on?" insisted Mommie.

Pa snorted. "I don't think I got anything to tell you don't know a'ready," he asseverated. "I'll bet a picayune you're at the bottom o' this hull business. You look too innercent. You ac' like the cat as et the canary."

Mommie laughed, her cheeks very pink. Deftly she took the hot plates from the oven. "Come on in to breakfast," she said. "I'll tell you all about it." And Mommie did. "You see, I knew Melissa Shand was matron," she finished, "an' Meliss' 'n' me didn't study out'n the same speller two hull winters for nothin'. I knew she'd do as I said. You c'n depend on Meliss'. But I had a ter'ble time figurin' out what, an' then had to go over to Mis' Miller's t' phone—an' fib 'bout why I went," deprecatingly. "Alice got interested up attic—it wan't hard keeping her; an' then the car come. I heard it stop under the weeping willer. That's why supper was late," placidly.

Curiously Pa Hollister eyed his wife, a whimsical twinkle in his gaze. "Called on the Orphanage!" he ejaculated. Then, "But why did you have Meliss' send out twins?"

Mommie's dreamy gaze settled on the milk pitcher. "To fill up the—empty spaces," she murmured.

"But twins!" chortled her life partner.

"Yes, twins. Of course." And then, practically, "Alice was brought up'n a big family—ten. And Stevie—you know, Pa, there were four boys and four girls of the Perbrinks. Stevie the youngest. It come to me all of a suddent: Alice an' Stevie's honeymoon was a-wearin' pretty thin, like ice in spring, and them two a-holding on for dear life, not daring to let go, not knowing all summer was jes' ahead! Real life ain't made up o' honeymoons, no more'n years are made up o' equinoxes."

"Yes," nodded Pa; "but the twins?" suggestively.

"I'm a-comin' to 'em," assured his wife. "I made out as Stevie 'n' Alice was straight lonesome—rattling round in that big house like two peas in a pod—being natur'ly used to so many folks about. They didn't know what to do with themselves—or how to ac'—just two. An' when Meliss' said as there was twins——"

"They're going t' keep 'em—both," informed Pa.

"And they won't have time to think about the—empty spaces," murmured Mommie. "I reckon, Alice's trunk'll be—unpacked," happily.

"Tickled as kids over Christmas stockings," added the man.

"I'm going right over—after dishes," said the woman. And then, with sudden thought, "Don't you ever dast tell, Pa; don't you ever dast tell how that basket o' babies come on Alice's back porch!"

And Pa, going out to split kindling, fine like Mommie loved to have it, chuckled to himself: "Count on Mommie fixin' things," proudly. "Mommie can allus do suthin'." . . . And as Pa Hollister piled the last stick of kindling he paused to look over at the Honeymoon House, and chuckle again—contentedly: Steve and Alice were going to live happily ever after!

Do You Love Your Father?

By President BLANCHARD, of Wheaton College

OME years ago I was preaching in Minneapolis, and a young man stepped up to me and said, "Do you remember telling us when you were e three years ago that we ought to kiss our fathers?" eplied that I did not remember it, but that I often such things, and very likely I had said it. He d, "We were never demonstrative in our home, and her did not get a great deal in the way of expression affection from us children. I made up my mind n that it was a good thing. So when I got home, I lked up to father, put my arms around his neck, sed him, and said, 'Father, I am thankful for you. u are a good father.' He cried like a little child, d I cried too. It worked a complete change in our me life. We lived comfortably before. We really red for one another, but we have never gotten away m that day."

I am sure that there are thousands of homes where ere is real loyalty between husbands and wives, rents and children, but this loyalty is not expressed it should be, and the result is oftentimes very sad. This little story, which I have often told in public dresses since that time, was brought to my mind by an incident related to me by Mr. Charles E. Putnam, now of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, but formerly a ranchman and a business man in Kansas.

We were chatting in my office one day, when Mr. Putnam said, "A gentleman once asked me if my father helped me in my business start. I replied 'No'"

Mr. Putnam was thinking purely of money and his father did not have money to give him, so he made his own start so far as that was concerned. He continued, "I was thinking after that of what father really did for me, and I was compelled to modify my thought in respect to that matter.

"When I was a young fellow, I thought I would like to go into the lumber trade. I had saved up fifteen hundred dollars from some farming enterprise I had been in. I put one thousand dollars in the lumber business and five hundred into a little home. My partners and backers were millionaire lumbermen of Hannibal, Mo. They took the financial responsibility. I took the responsibility of management and we divided the profits.

"Years afterward, I got to thinking how strange it was that these wealthy men should have trusted me as they did without security, putting their capital really in my power, so far as the branch business was concerned.

"I said to one of them one day, 'How did it happen that you trusted me as you did, a young man without much experience, with very little capital? It has seemed strange to me that you gave me such large confidence as you did.'

"He replied briefly, but with a smile which I shall never forget, 'I knew your father.'

"So the fact really was that I owed my father for my opportunity. If he had not been the sort of a man he was, I would not have been trusted as I was.

"So that, instead of it being true that my father did not help me in business, it was a fact that my whole business career, so far as it was determined by that engagement, was to be credited to his integrity and kindly relations with his fellow men.

"I imagine that most of us do not know very well to whom we are indebted. Perhaps it would be a good thing, once in a while, for us to undertake to learn. It probably would not hurt other people at all, and almost certainly it would do us good."

Most Important Thing in the World

A DISTINGUISHED layman, Edward Filene, of Boston, business man, philanthropist and director of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, recently declared that the most important thing in the world at this moment is to see that the Peace Conference, in establishing the League of Nations, makes such provision as will insure lasting peace.

Nowise less important is it for the happiness and moral and spiritual progress of the world that there should be unity in the Christian churches. And that unity is coming. There is a sound of marching in the air. Unmistakable indications of activity and progress are found in the deliverances from pulpits all over the land, which set forth boldly to the American churches the challenge of the new era. These men who have broken the silence have seen the larger vision. They are not afraid of criticism, or to give to the people the message which has illumined their own souls. They know that if the leaders fail to rise to the present occasion, others stand ready to take their places, who will bring to the task a loyalty and zeal for Christian Unity that cannot be withstood. They feel that for the Church, this is today the most important thing in the world!

Little wonder then that it is a time calculated to arouse the indifferent. All the denominations feel the thrill of the new day and all hear the call to the task it has brought. At the front of the movement are the broadest and most evangelical minds in America—men whose voices cannot be silenced. Their ranks are swelling from day to day. The university professors and theological seminarians are coming into line. Some of the more outspoken have not hesitated to declare that now is the Church's Judgment Day, and that it will result in sweeping away the old separatist methods and divisive policies. The churches are summoned to judge their own case; to declare whether they will continue in the old ruts, or unite as a mighty army, ready to enter the victorious struggle. We do not believe that the churches in America will be found wanting; rather do we take the confident view that the inspiration of the new vision will prevail, and that it will work a marvelous change. We are now in the initial stages of a universal spiritual awakening in which not the Church only, but the outside multitudes, are to share. It is for us to welcome it and to enter into the work of translating into action the splendid ideals that go with a united Church such as Christ himself foreshadowed.

Looking forward, we may almost visualize the Church of tomorrow. It will be a church abounding with warm brotherly love; a Church that understands the real value of Christian service, rendered gladly, in season and out of season. There will be no little coteries of self-seeking and self-saving churches, as in the old days; but each will strive to the utmost to be helpful to all. Loyal to the essentials of the faith, the Church of tomorrow will be pervaded by the spirit of generosity, in dealing with those who differ concerning things that are immaterial. The Church of tomorrow, in the most exalted sense, will be a missionary church, with a far-flung influence and a power in unity which it never could have wielded in the old days of rivalry and separation.

Hunger

ONE of the saddest legacies of the war is the hunger of Europe and the Near East. Hunger transforms men, and when it affects great masses, as it is doing today, disaster, riot, revolution result. Humanity fed is comparatively docile; famished it is capable of being changed into a wild beast.

Early in the war, it fell to America to feed the non-combatants in the contending countries, and it has performed its task well. In these four years our nation has sent breadstuffs practically into all the western war-stricken lands. It now becomes our task to feed the starving peoples in still other sections of Europe, who are striving to check the westward flow of Bolshevism. Our first Congressional appropriation of $100,000,000 will be administered under Mr. Hoover's skilful direction in Europe and the Near East, including Armenia, Syria, Greece and part of Asia Minor, these being in the most immediate need. Poland, which has suffered so deeply, will be helped with a $2,000,000 cargo of food now on the way.

It is hoped that this campaign against hunger will prove a material aid in pacification. How it must thrill the hearts of God's people everywhere to know that, apart from all other considerations, this nation has accepted as a Christian duty this new campaign of feeding the famished multitudes. There are those who criticize our Government's relief plans in Europe, and who say it is no concern of this nation. We rejoice in the fact that our administration takes a different view, and thinks that it is worth while. We are not in Europe for any selfish purpose. We are in Europe to help make the world a better place to live in, and if, incidentally, it comes to us as a duty, we are glad to be able to carry out the good old injunction: "If thine enemy hunger, feed him." Further, we believe that past experience has convinced this Government that there is no better investment than international sympathy and kindness well bestowed, and especially at a time like the present.

Real Americanization

GRAHAM WALLAS, Professor of Political Science at the University of London, speaking at the conference of the Education Association, said that an advisory committee of London University has found it impossible to teach special subjects in history if attention is concentrated solely upon the British Empire. He added:

"The principle of nationality which has had evil as well as good effects, and which has shattered the world and may even shatter the Peace Conference, requires closer examination."

If this applies to Britain, it applies with infinitely more force and meaning to America.

Through avowed policy and in actual practice our nation from the beginning has avoided entangling alliances with other nations. We have had good reasons. The development of the boundless natural resources of a virgin continent, the assimilation of freedom-seeking refugees from all oppressed lands and the working out of our own scheme of government and our own ideals and destiny as a self-ruling people have given us plenty to do and to think about at home.

But while the wisdom of this course up to this time is not doubted, the possibility of its continuance has been suddenly swept away. Our decisive part in the world war has made us a decisive factor in world peace at present and in all world affairs of the future.

We could not turn back if we would. America is today and for the future the financial, industrial and political center of the world. Whether it is to be also, what is far more important, the moral and intellectual center, is for the American people themselves to determine. We can be this, too, and ought to be.

Our knowledge of the outside world has been meager and narrow. Our school histories have been authoritatively condemned again and again as being largely self-praise and exclusive of the viewpoints of other peoples. This is strikingly illustrated in the fact that even American history, so far as the Civil War at least is concerned, is not in the South what it is in the North. It is again illustrated in the current proposal that the history of our Revolution as taught in our schools for a century and a half shall now be rewritten in the spirit of present American-British concord.

If the American people are to become intellectually worthy of that foremost place in world affairs to which in so many respects they are eminently fitted, there must be a decided change in our histories from provincial narrowness to cosmopolitan breadth.

Educationally we must cease detaching ourselves from the affairs of the rest of the world and begin adjusting ourselves to them as a large, increasing and dominating part of them. Our flag, our trade, our political and moral influence are to encircle the earth, and our intelligence must not fall short. We must study the ways, the customs, the wants, the histories, traditions, aspirations and ideals of all peoples. Americanization means not a further narrowing of national spirit, but the broadening of it into humanitarian world spirit.

America is to be a potent message of freedo and justice to all lands, and that message should be true one. It is to be a mighty power throughout th earth, and that power should be exerted unde standingly

Upon the coming generations in this country wi devolve immeasurable responsibilities and duties to a mankind, and the preparation should be now and i the public schools.

No Annexations; No Indemnities

THE world had almost forgotten that phrase—"no annexations; no indemnities"—so famous and magical a year ago.

President Wilson has suddenly revived it with al its old-time power to thrill and has given it definite meaning and direct application.

The future of the colonies taken from Germany has assumed a place as one of the most interesting of the immediate phases of the many-sided problems under consideration by the supreme council of the Peace Conference. The American plan, as promptly and forcefully set forth by President Wilson and the American delegation, looks to international control of the colonies, backward nationalities and tribes by individual powers or by agents to be known as "mandatories" of the League of Nations. These agents are to derive their powers from the League and to act entirely on the lines of policy dictated by that body.

America is asking nothing out of the war but justice to all. The stand taken in this matter is clearly in line with that policy.

At the same time President Wilson was announcing his firm opposition to indemnities. Reparation, he declares, is all that is justly to be asked for.

It is to be hoped that the President will be supported in this attitude by the good sense of all the nations. If annexations and indemnities as results of war can be made impossible, the chief incentive to wars will be removed.

The Future Looms Big

> "My Rheims business house is now entirely destroyed. But no matter. The future looms big."

THIS is part of a letter from a French business man. It shows the spirit of France. It is the spirit of a man and of a people who know no such word as defeat and will accept their disasters as new inspirations and turn their almost overwhelming misfortune into an incentive to new and higher achievements.

The people of France have given immeasurably to their country and to mankind, and in the giving they have sounded the real depths of their manhood and womanhood. The future looms large to them because they know they are large enough to make it so.

To our own business men, who have suffered only a temporary disarrangement of business, the brave words of this Frenchman come as a clarion call of courage. If amid the silence of the shattered ruins of Rheims the future looms large, how much larger it must loom amid the busy hum of production and commerce of our own land!

To employer and employee there is opportunity today such as the world never offered before for mutual cooperation, mutual endeavor and mutual achievement. In the rebuilding of the world there is work to keep all busy and to afford to all a generous profit.

But there must be rebuilding within the hearts of men as well. The growing spirit of brotherhood must more than cross the border lines of nations; it must wipe out the lines of classes. For at heart all men are brothers, striving together to the same purposes. With equality of opportunity, every man's future looms as large as he can envisage it, and he can make it just as large as his own manhood.

For material success is not all, nor the most. Bigger and bigger ever looms the future to the man or woman who is steadily growing in the higher qualities of the mind and the heart and soul.

For Soldiers' Education

TO EXPRESS his gratitude to those who made the supreme sacrifice, . La Verne W. Noyes of the class of 2 at Chicago University has given to s Alma Mater $2,500,000 to be used the education of soldiers of this r, their children and descendants. cluded in the bequest was the elegant oyes home on Lake Shore Drive, ilt while Mrs. Noyes was living. Dr. oyes reserves the home for his life use, and then it will go to the La Verne Noyes Foundation, as the $2,500,000 gift is called. Dr. Noyes had already given to the Chicago University the Ida Noyes Hall in memory of his wife at a cost of a half million dollars. Could any benevolence on earth be more beautiful than this gift for the education of the precious boys who offered their lives to their country? It is noble for such men to leave money by will to benevolent institutions. How much more beautiful it is for them to give their money to these good causes while they are alive to see it do the good and share the happiness of grateful hearts, and not wait for death to numb their fingers so that they cannot hold the dollar any longer! Dr. Noyes in his princely gifts for education recognizes this great fact. "Wisdom is the principal thing." (Prov. 4 : 7.)

Utah's Temple of the Gods

LEROY JEFFERS, in the Scientific American, gives a graphic description of the "Temple of the Gods" in Utah. Among other things he says: "Here are great hillsides composed of limestone, clay and gravel which have been eroded into fantastic towers 25 to 400 feet in height. So symmetrical are these ribbed and fluted pillars that they seem almost to have been turned with a lathe, and they often resemble kiosks or taper to minarets. The temples are banded with red and salmon and yellow that is mixed with pink, while many of the spires are tipped with white. Looking across the largest or southern amphitheater toward the distant hillside we see as it were a vast city of prehistoric ruins; while, from the topmost bastion of the surrounding cliffs, we look down upon the stage setting of a fairy opera. From below the walls and towers have all the reality of castles, or elsewhere resemble the gigantic temples of India." What a generous system of National Parks our government has provided, and how surpassingly beautiful this Temple of the Gods that has remained so nearly hidden in the Sevier National Forest! Utah is now in harmony with the moral standards and progress of our times, expelling the saloon from the borders, and being one of the 36 states to ratify National Constitutional prohibition. All nature with its mountains, valleys, streams, forests, flowers, and witchery of beauty are the temple of God, and so are human hearts. And this fact is their greatest glory, happiness and destiny: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you?" (I Cor. 3 : 16.)

388-Carat Diamond Mined

A CABLEGRAM from Cape Town to London announces that a soft blue-white diamond weighing 388 carats has been found in the Jaagersfontein mine in South Africa. It is twice the size of the celebrated Kohinoor diamond. In 1905 the same Jaagersfontein mine yielded a mammoth diamond that weighed 3,025 carats, or 1½ pounds. It was presented by the Transvaal government to King Edward of England, and was cut into stones, one of which, finished, weighs 516½ carats, and is regarded as the most remarkable brilliant in the possession of man. The Jews were fond of jewelry and dealt in precious stones. Christ uses an exceedingly valuable stone as a symbol of his religion: "Again the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant man, seeking goodly pearls; who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it." (Matt. 13 : 45, 46.)

The Celebration of Old North Church

THE "Old North Church" of Boston recently celebrated its 195th birthday. This is the historic church from whose tall steeple were flashed the signal lanterns which told the colonists of the approach of the British army and started Paul Revere on his famous ride to warn the inhabitants along the route and to notify Hancock and Adams at Lexington of the enemy's approach. On June 15, 1686, Rev. Robert Ratcliffe, sent out by the Bishop of London, organized the first church society in Boston; two years afterward the Kings Chapel was built, and in 1723 the Rev. Samuel Miles, rector of King's Chapel, laid the cornerstone with these words: "May the gates of hell never prevail against it." The official name of this church is Christ's Church. The building is a brick structure 70 feet long by 42 feet high, with a spire reaching 172 feet from the ground. The building has a beautiful churchly interior. In it is a bust of Washington which LaFayette pronounced the most lifelike of any he had seen. A hundred and eighty-five years ago King George II of England presented the church with a Bible which was popularly called the "Vinegar Bible" because by a misprint it recorded the parable of the "Vinegar" instead of "Vineyard." The chimes of bells in the steeple are among the sweetest in America. Paul Revere arranged that if the British on their way to Concord to destroy the military stores there should approach by land there should be one signal lamp hung in the steeple; if by the sea, two lamps should be swung. Robert Newman, the sexton of the church, displayed the signal lights. In 1878 the city of Boston put a Revere memorial tablet in the tower. In every period of our commonwealth the Church and loyalty have gone side by side: religion and patriotism are the children of the same divine parent. Rev. Dr. Timothy Cutler, the first rector of the church, at its dedication preached from this text: "For mine house shall be called an house of prayer for all people." (Isa. 56 : 7.)

Ten Years Building Home

A MAN in California has been three years building a home, and it will take him seven more years to finish it. The reason is that he is doing all the work himself at odd hours. It will be a queer-looking structure, made of cobblestones and sand which nature put on the ground, covered with red tiles made from clay on the premises. The foundations are 50 x 42 feet, and the outside stone walls are 42 inches thick at the base. There is a small chapel, a bell tower, a cloister and a "sacred garden" in imitation of the one at Santa Barbara. If the tower at the front corner were left off the building would look more like a prison or a tomb than a home. The account said the man was erecting the building to be occupied by him as his home, and that he would house in it a small printing plant which he operates. The account did not say whether the man was married and had a family or not. It is presumed that he has.

Hard brick and stone and red tiling would be very cold and meaningless without a wife and children and loved ones. They are the things that spell home. Without them a house, however substantially or patiently built, is but a dungeon or tomb. The man in California, like everybody else, is constructing a building of character that takes a long time to build. Each one must build it for himself. Men and women, angels and devils, God himself, may aid, but each one has been set to the task of building his own house of character, which is but another way of saying he has to build up his soul himself, and to do so out of such material and in such a manner that it may be God's residence. The apostle thus expresses the thought: "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house." (I Peter 2 : 5.)

New York Ratifies

ON JANUARY 29 New York State ratified Constitutional Prohibition. The Anti-Salloon leaders and the people put up a great fight and won a great victory. All have ratified but Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, which, with perhaps one exception, will follow. All the cry against the constitutionality of such action is the vaporing of the liquor attorneys and papers subsidized by them. The dry nation obeys this injunction: "Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good." (Rom. 12 : 9.)

CHAPTER VIII

RUTH sat looking into space with starry eyes and glowing cheeks after she had read the letter. It seemed to her a wonderful letter—quite the most wonderful she had ever received. Perhaps it was because it fitted so perfectly with her ideal of the writer, who from her little girlhood had always been a picture of what a hero might be. She used to dream big things about him when she was a child. He had been the best baseball player in school when he was ten, and the handsomest little rowdy in town, as well as the boldest, bravest champion of the little girls.

As she grew older and met him occasionally she had always been glad that he kept his old hero looks in spite of rough garb sometimes. She had known that they were poor. There had been some story about a loss of money and a long expensive sickness of the father's following some kind of an accident, which made all the circumstances most trying, but she had never heard the details. She only knew that most of the girls in her set looked on him as a nobody and would no more have companied with him than with their father's chauffeur. After he grew older and went to college some of the girls began to say he was good-looking, and that it was quite commendable in him to try to get an education. They even unearthed the fact that his was a fine old family in former days, and that there had been wealth and servants once. But the story died down as John Cameron walked his quiet way apart, keeping to his old friends and not responding to the fitful advances of the girls. Ruth had been away at school in these days and had seldom seen him. When she had there had always been that lingering admiration for him from the old days. She had told herself that of course he could not be worth much or people would know him. He was probably ignorant and uncultured, and a closer acquaintance would show him far from what her young ideas had pictured her hero. But somehow, that day at the station, the look in his face had revealed fine feeling, and she was glad now to have her intuition concerning him verified by his letter.

And what a letter it was! Why, no young man of her acquaintance could have written with such poetic delicacy. That paragraph about the rose was beautiful, and not a bit too presuming in one who had been a perfect stranger all these years. She liked his simple frankness and the easy way he went back twelve years and began just where they left off. There was none of the bold forwardness that might have been expected in one who had not moved in cultured society. There was no unpleasant assumption of familiarity which might have emphasized her fear that she had overstepped the bounds of convention in writing to him in the first place. On the contrary, her humiliation at his long-delayed answer was all forgotten now. He had understood her perfectly and accepted her letter in exactly the way she had meant it, without the least bit of foolishness or unpleasantness. In short, he had written the sort of letter that the kind of man she had always hoped he was, would be likely to write, and it gave her a surprisingly pleasant feeling of satisfaction. It was as if she had discovered a friend all of her own, neither made for her by her family, nor one to whom she fell heir because of her wealth and position; but just one she had found out in the great world of souls.

If he had been going to remain at home there might have been a number of questions, social and conventional, which would have arisen to bar the way to this free feeling of friendship, and which she would have had to meet and reason with before her mind would have shaken itself free; but as he was going away, and on such an errand, perhaps never to return, the matter of what her friends might think, or what the world would say, simply did not enter into the question at all. The war had lifted them both above such ephemeral barriers into the place of vision where a soul was a soul, no matter what he possessed or who he was. So, as she sat in her big white room with all its dainty accessories to a luxurious life, fit setting for a girl so lovely, she smiled unhindered at this bit of beautiful friendship that had suddenly drifted down at her feet out of a great outside unknown world. She touched her letter thoughtfully with caressing fingers, and with the kind of high look in her eyes that the lady of old must have worn when she thought of her knight. It came to her that she had not felt so about any other of her men friends who had gone into the service. Why should this special one soldier boy represent the whole war, as it were, to her? However, it was but a passing thought, and with a smile still upon her lips she went to the drawer and brought out the finely knitted garments she had made, wrapping them up with care and sending them at once upon their way. It somehow gave her pleasure to set aside other plans she had made for that afternoon until she had posted the package herself.

Even then, when she took her belated way to a little gathering in honor of one of her girl friends who was going to be married the next week to a young aviator, she kept the smile on her lips and the dreamy look in her eyes, and now and then brought herself back from the chatter around her to remember that something pleasant had happened. Not that there was any foolishness in her thoughts. There was too much dignity and simplicity about the girl, young as she was, to allow her to deal even with her own thoughts in any but a maidenly way, and it was not in the ordinary way of a maid with a man that she thought of this young soldier. He was so far removed from her life in every way, by all the well-drilled formalities, that it never occurred to her to think of him in the way she thought of her other men friends.

A friend who understood her, and whom she could understand. That was what she had always wanted, and what she had never quite had with any of her young associates. One or two had approached to that point, but always they had fallen short. That she should make this man her friend, in that intimate sense of the word, did not occur to her even yet. He was somehow set apart for service in her mind, and as such she had chosen him to be her special knight, she to be the lady to whom he might look for encouragement, whose honor he was going forth to defend. It was a misty, dreamy ideal of a thought. Somehow she wouldn't have picked out one of her other men friends to be a knight for her. They were too flippant, too careless and light-hearted. They might have patriotism down at the bottom of all their froth and boasting; doubtless they had, but there was so little seriousness about them that one would never think of them as knights—defenders of some great cause of righteousness. Perhaps she was all wrong. Perhaps it was only her old baby fancy for the little boy who could always "lick" the other boys and save the girls from trouble that prejudiced her in his favor, but at least it was pleasant and a great relief to know that her impulsive letter had not been misunderstood.

The girls prattled of this one and that who were "going over" soon, told of engagements, and marriages soon to occur, criticized the brides and grooms to be, declared their undying opinions about what was fitting for a war bride to wear, and whether they would like to marry a man who had to go right into war and might return minus an arm or an eye. They discoursed about the U-boats with a frothy cheerfulness that made Ruth shudder, and in the same breath told what nice eyes a young captain had who had recently visited the town, and what perfectly lovely uniforms he wore, and whether a girl should wear an olive drab suit this year if she wanted to look really smart.

They were the girls among whom she had been brought up, and Ruth was used to their froth, but somehow today it bored her beyond expression. She was glad to make an excuse to get away, and she drove her little car around by the way of John Cameron's home, hoping to get a glimpse of his mother again. But the little house had a shut-up look behind the clematis that he had planted, as if it were lonely and lying back in a long wait till he should come—or not come! A pang went through her heart. For the first time she thought what it meant for a young life like that to be silenced by cold steel. The home empty! The mother alone! His ambitions and hopes unfulfilled! It came to her too that if he were her knight he might have to die for her—for his cause! She shuddered and swept the unpleasant thought away, but it had left its mark and would return again.

On the way home she passed a number of young soldiers home on twenty-four-hour leave from the near-by camps. They saluted most eagerly, and she knew that any one of them would gladly have occupied the vacant seat in her car, but she was not in the mood to talk. She felt that there was something to be thought out and fixed in her mind, some impression that life had for her that afternoon that she did not want to lose in the mild fritter of gay banter that would be sure to follow if she stopped and took home some of the boys. So she bowed graciously and swept by at high speed as if in a great hurry. The war! The war was beating itself into her brain again in much the same way it had done on that morning when the drafted men went away, only now it had taken on a more personal touch. She kept seeing the lonely vine-clad house where that one soldier had lived, and which he had left so desolate; and thinking how many, many such homes and mothers there must be in the land!

That evening when she was free to go to her room she read John Cameron's letter again; and then, feeling almost as if she were childish in her haste, she sat down and wrote an answer. That second reading had made plain his wish for an answer.

When John Cameron received that letter and the accompanying package he was lifted into the seventh heaven for a little while. He forgot all his misgivings, he even forgot Lieutenant Wainwright. He put on his new sweater and swelled around the way the other boys did when they got sweaters, letting them all admire him. He examined the wonderful socks almost reverently, putting a large curious finger gently on the red and blue stripes and almost thrilling with the thought that her fingers had plied the many, many stitches to make them. He almost felt it would be sacrilege to wear them, and laid them away most carefully, locking them into the box under his bed lest some other fellow should admire and desire them to his loss. But the letter he walked away into th woods as far as the bounds of the can would allow and read and reread it, ing at last from it as one refreshed fro comforting meal after long fasting. was on the way back to his barra that night, walking slowly under t starlight, not desiring to be back the last minute before night taps use he did not wish to break the w derful evening he had spent with her, t he resolved to try to get leave next Saturday and go home to than r.

Back in the barracks with th thers he fairly scintillated with wit a kept his comrades in roars of laugh until the officer of the night suppress them summarily. But long after th thers were asleep he lay watching a s that shone through a crack in the ro ove his cot and twinkled with ndly gleam, thinking of her and list ng to the singing in his soul. And on again there came the thought of G and gratitude for this lovely frien p in his life. If he knew where God s he would like to thank him. Lying and looking up to the star, he breath from his heart a wordless thanksgivin

The next night he wrote and her he was coming, and asked permi on to call and thank her face to face. Then he fairly haunted the post-office mail time the rest of the week, hopin r an answer. He had not written his other about his coming, for he meant to go this week if there came no wo from Ruth. Besides, it would be nice urprise his mother. Then there w some doubt about his getting a pa this week, and so between the two a ties he was kept busy up to the last te. But Friday evening he got hi pass, and in the last mail came a spe delivery from Ruth, just a brief no aying she had been away from hom hen his letter arrived, but she wo be delighted to see him on Sunday ernoon as he had suggested.

He felt like a boy let loose from ool as he brushed up his uniform a polished his big army shoes while ss fortunate companions kidded him ut the girl he was going to see. He ed their thrusts joyously, in his art repudiating any such personaliti yet somehow it was pleasant. He n't ever realized how pleasant it wo be to have a girl and be going to see — such a girl! Of course she wasn for him—not with that possessivenes But she was a friend, a real friend, a he wouldn't let anything spoil the pl ure of that!

He had not thought anything his army experience could be so excit as that first ride back home again. mehow the deference paid to his un m got into his blood and made hi el that people all along the line reall id care for what the boys were doi for them. It made camp life and har ps seem less dreary.

It was great to get back to his tle mother and put his big arms aroun er again. She seemed so small. Ha he shrunken since he left her, or w he grown so much huskier with the o door life? Both, perhaps, and he l ed at her sorrowfully. She was so tle and quiet and brave to bear li all alone. If he only could get back nd get to succeeding in life so that he ht make some brightness for her! he had borne so much in her life, an he ought not to have looked so old nd worn at her age! For a brief in at again his heart was almost bitter, nd he wondered what God meant by g ng his good little mother so much tro le. Was there a God whe such ngs could be? He resolved to do somet ng about finding out this very day.

It was pleasant to help his m er about the kitchen, saving her as he ad not been saved since he left, telling r about the camp, and listening to r tearful admiration of him. She uld scarcely take her eyes from him, seemed so tall and big and handsome his uniform; he seemed so much der and more manly that her heart arned for her boy who seemed to be ipping away from her. It was so eavenly blessed to sit down beside im and sew on a button and mend a rn spot in his flannel shirt and have im pat her shoulder now and then ntentedly.

Then she sent him down to the store r something nice for dinner, and atched him through the window with a nile of pride and the tears running own her cheeks. How tall and straight e walked! How like his father when e first knew him! She hoped the eighbors all were looking out and ould see him. Her boy! Her soldier oy! And he must go away from her, erhaps to die!

But—he was here today! She would ot think of the rest. She would rejoice ow in his presence.

He walked briskly down the street, ast the houses that had been familiar ll his life, meeting people who had ever been wont to notice him before; nd they smiled upon him from afar ow, greeted him with enthusiasm, and rned to look after him as he passed on. t gave him a curious feeling to have so uch attention from people who had ever even known him before. It made im feel strangely small, yet filled with a reat pride and patriotism for the ountry that was his, and the govern- ent which he now represented to them ll. He was something more to them ow than just one of the boys about own who had grown up among them. He was a soldier of the United States. He had given his life for the cause of righteousness. The bitterness he might have felt at their former ignoring of him was all swallowed up in their genuine and hearty friendliness now.

He met the white-haired minister, kindly and dignified, who paused to ask him how he liked camp life and to commend him as a soldier. Looking in his strong, gentle face John Cameron remembered his resolve.

He flashed a keen look at the gracious countenance and made up his mind to speak:

"I'd like to ask you a question, Dr. Thurlow. It's been bothering me quite a little ever since this question of going away to fight has been in my mind. Is there any way that a man—that I—can find God? That is, if there is a God. I've never thought much about it before, but life down there in camp makes a lot of things seem different, and I've been wondering. I'm not sure what I believe. Is there any way I can find out?"

A pleasant gleam of surprise and delight thrilled into the deep blue eyes of the minister. It was startling. It almost embarrassed him for a moment, it was so unexpected to have a soldier ask a question about God. It was almost mortifying that he had never thought to take the initiative on that question with the young man.

"Why, certainly!" he said heartily. "Of course, of course. I'm very glad to know you are interested in those things. Couldn't you come into my study and talk with me? I think I could help you. I'm sure I could."

"I haven't much time," said Cameron shyly, half ashamed now that he had opened his heart to an almost stranger. He wasn't even his mother's minister, and he was a comparative newcomer in the town. How had he come to speak to him so impulsively?

"I understand, exactly, of course," said the minister with growing eagerness. "Could you come in now for five or ten minutes? I'll turn back with you and you can just stop on your way, or we can talk as we go. Were you thinking of uniting with the church? We have our communion the first Sunday of next month. I should be very glad if you could arrange—we have a number of young people coming in now. I'd like to see you come with them. The church is a good safe place to be. It was established by Christ. It is a school in which to learn of him. It is—"

"But I'm not what you would call a Christian!" protested Cameron. "I don't even know that I believe in the Bible. I don't know what your church believes. I don't have a very definite idea what any church believes. I would be a hypocrite to stand up and join a church when I wasn't sure there was a God."

"My dear young fellow!" said the minister affectionately. "Not at all! Not at all! The church is the place for young people to come when they have doubts. It is a shelter, and a growing place. Just trust yourself to God and come in among his people, and your doubts will vanish. Don't worry about doubts. Many people have doubts. Just let them alone and put yourself in the right way, and you will forget them. I should be glad to talk with you further. I would like to see you come into communion with God's people. If you want to find God you should come where he has promised to be. It is a great thing to have a fine young fellow like you, a soldier, array himself on the side of God. I would like to see you stand up on the right side before you go out to meet danger and perhaps death."

John Cameron stood watching him as he talked.

"He's a good old guy," he thought gravely, "but he doesn't get my point. He evidently believes what he says, but I don't just see going blindfold into a church. However, there's something to what he says about going where God is if I want to find him."

Out loud he merely said:

"I'll think about it, Doctor, and perhaps come in to see you the next time I'm home." Then he excused himself and went on to the store.

As he walked away he said to himself: "I wonder what Ruth Macdonald would say if I asked her the same question. I wonder if she has thought anything about it. I wonder if I'd ever have the nerve to ask her."

The next morning he suggested to his mother that they go to Dr. Thurlow's church together. She would very much have preferred going to her own church with him, but she knew that he did not care for the minister and had never been very friendly with the people, so she put aside her secret wish and went with him. To tell the truth, she was very proud to go anywhere with her handsome soldier son, and one thing that made her the more willing was that she remembered that the Macdonalds always went to that church, and perhaps they would be there today and Ruth would see them together and speak to them. But she said not a word of this to her boy.

The Church After the War

IT IS assumed by some that the process of national and international reconstruction about to be undertaken in Europe intimately oncerns the Christian Church, and hat the lessons of the war have taught he denominations the necessity of an cclesiastical reconstruction.

If so, upon what lines should it roceed? Organic union of a more or ess comprehensive character is advoated by many. The Faith and Order novement of the Protestant Episcopal hurch looks to a general reunion of rotestants and Catholics. The Presyterian General Assembly at Columus, Ohio, last May, provided for the onference for the reunion of all vangelical churches in the United tates which met at Philadelphia and hich resulted in a great step forard.

Are we ready for ecclesiastical recontruction in the United States on the resbyterian, or any other proposition? would like to point out some of the lements of the problem.

In the first place, if ecclesiastical econstruction is to take a similar ourse to that which President Wilson's amous Fourteen Points suggested for the ecasting of the governments of Europe, ve must have regard for the priniple of autonomy. He did not propose ewer national sovereignties, but more, nsisting that a Polish state be created. In other words, it is not consolidation f minor sovereignties that he had in nind, but a free movement toward eparate sovereignties of the various peoples, according to their respective racial and national proclivities and aspirations.

In the second place, the President's plan for Europe assumed that there are sound reasons for giving the smaller nations equal rights of existence with the larger in the family of sovereignties; that the several Balkan states would have to sacrifice more than they would gain by being forced to unite in one great state, and that each can, in its own way, best work out its own problems and thus contribute most to the peace and prosperity of Europe.

NOW, what are the ecclesiastical conditions in the United States? They are much like the conditions which will obtain in Europe if the President's plan of reorganization is worked out. We have a number of independent ecclesiastical sovereignties, so to speak. The great body of Protestants is embraced largely in five communions, or groups—Baptist, Lutheran, Methodist, Presbyterian and Protestant Episcopal. The roots of these communions run back into another continent and far into the past. They have distinct forms of government and worship and different methods of work, and each lives and moves in an atmosphere of its own. They have had hitherto the utmost freedom of "autonomous development," including the right to divide, and all this seems to have been consistent with their unparalleled prosperity. The various divisions of Baptists, Lutherans, Methodists, Presbyterians have denominational affinities among themselves, and might, if they thought best, readily unite, Baptists with Baptists, Lutherans with Lutherans, Methodists with Methodists, etc. But the affinities between the groups are not so apparent. Baptists might unite among themselves, or with Congregationalists, or Disciples of Christ; but how could they be happy in a union with Presbyterians or Methodists? And how could their practices, methods of work and teaching be harmonized? Not assuredly by a resolution to consolidate. Similar conditions mark diversities between the other groups. Individuals pass from one of these communions to another without apparent difficulty; but consolidation of the communions themselves, with their distinct histories, ideas, habits of thought and work, methods of procedure, radical differences of government, etc., is not a matter of mechanical adjustment, but one of gradual growth in spirit, in affinity, and in convergence toward a common agreement.

To force by pressure of argument, or influence, religious bodies of diverse history, methods and organization into an organic union for which they are not ready would result in the loss of initiative, efficiency and power of service, and would be a kind of tyranny, and nothing is more foreign to the spirit of the Gospel than tyranny. God grants full liberty to every individual, and those who represent him in his Church must not be too ready to reach desirable ends by force. Let the denominations be free to live and work in their own way, respecting, preferring and loving one another, until they are ready to unite. The Bible recognizes diversity of gifts, but the same spirit; diversity of ministries, but the same Lord; and diversity of workings, but the same God. We have a diversity of organizations and methods, but the same Lord and the same Church.

I PLEAD for a continuance of the American spirit of autonomous development, and recognition of the right of the smaller as well as the larger bodies to worship God and work for his Kingdom in their own way, under the guidance of their conscience. A union by vote of a mere majority is of doubtful value, as that of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, for example, which did not reduce the number of denominations, but left much irritation, controversy and ill-feeling behind it. The late Lutheran union was complete, harmonious and successful, because the three bodies were ripe for it.

This plea is not in justification of all existing separate bodies. Most of them are small and insignificant, due often not to enlightened conscience, but to pride, ambition and unwillingness to cooperate where they cannot rule.

What, then, are the lessons of the hour?

First, universal recognition of the principle of interdenominational fellowship and comity, and loyal observance of it. "We be brethren," and brethren ought not to quarrel, or make raids upon one another's flocks, or intrude into communities already fully occupied. Denominational rivalry is unworthy and inexcusable.

Second, cooperation and federation for the promotion of common causes and objects. Nobody and no Church has been hurt in the cooperation of Protestant, Catholic and Jew in war work; but the common purpose was promoted, and many hearts delighted and comforted to see the adherents of faiths which cannot be surrendered or merged working in harmony in humanitarian effort. The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America is a fine demonstration of the possibility of Christian unity and cooperation between evangelical churches of all creeds, polities and practices. More of this unity is desirable.

Third, reunion of such bodies as the Northern, Southern and United Presbyterian Churches; as the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South; as the Northern and Southern Baptist Conventions; as the Lutheran Synod of Ohio and the United Lutheran Church—always remembering that these unions may be judiciously promoted, but should never be forced, and that if they cannot be harmoniously brought about, the churches are far better apart.

One of the things most desirable, it seems to me, is to secure such a state of feeling between the denominations as will allow the fullest fraternity; a feeling based on the solid ground of adherence to one's own faith, with such respect for other's faiths as will admit of brotherly association for the promotion of common interests. The prophet Amos is often made responsible for aloofness. But when he asked the question, "Can two walk together, except they be agreed?" he could not have meant agreement in everything. If two agree to walk, and to walk in the same direction, at the same time and in the same path, they can surely walk together. If one wants to walk and the other to ride, or one wants to go east and the other west, obviously they cannot walk together. But they can agree to walk together without wearing the same uniform, or being of the same race or family, or having the same views of the questions of the day, or promising to walk together to the end of life. In other words, a Baptist can walk with a Methodist occasionally without compromising his own faith and practice; or a Presbyterian with an Episcopalian without denying the validity of his own ministry; or a Lutheran with a Quaker without surrendering the Lutheran view of the sacraments. A deeper, broader feeling of fraternity and a better understanding that men can be friends and brethren, even though they belong to different communions and do not think alike on all things, will bring a very substantial unity among the followers of our divine Lord.

The Expediency of the Ascension

*A SERMON BY REV. MILFORD W. FOSHAY

TEXT—John 16 : 7—"It is expedient for you that I go away."

THE expediency of the ascension of our Lord Jesus Christ is one of those truths whose blessings are not so readily accepted and received into the daily experience as some others. A strong feeling, frequently voiced, obtains with many Christians that it is a great misfortune to have Jesus beyond the reach of personal consultation. The longing to ask his advice on some particularly vexatious question, something which harrows the mind and burdens the heart, is persistent with most of us at times. I doubt if ever there was a Christian so strong in his appreciation of the meaning of the text as never at any time in his life to have heard this secret cry of his soul.

Is it, then, a misfortune that Jesus has ascended to the Father, rather than to have remained among his followers? It will be sure to strengthen our faith and quicken our activities, if we consider the matter from the standpoint of Jesus himself. In this way no such mistake will be made as is made, and not seldom, when we try to view this truth from our individual standpoint alone. By seeking Jesus' own interpretation of his act, this unique event which took place nearly two thousand years ago will not be merely a bit of ancient history whose mention of imminent occurrence brought consternation to the little group of disciples, and whose contemplation has been a source of perplexity to many Christians ever since; but it will become an occurrence whose Spirit-directed influence may touch vitally and helpfully every twentieth century follower of the Lord Jesus.

In the first place, Jesus stated simply and explicitly, in the text, that it was expedient for him to go away. So it does not really matter what may be our feelings and conceptions, our thoughts or desires in relation to this procedure. If they run contrary to our Lord's statement they are wrong, consequently injurious, if we persist in holding to them so as to permit them to influence our tendencies. He knows, we conjecture: and the sooner we can get rid of our imaginings for his certainties, the better it will be for us. This is not always easy to do; and in this particular case, to learn what we can of the meaning of his assertion, from his own explanation, and, following this, what we may learn from human experience—this will be to align ourselves on the side of all that is progressive in and loyal to the work of the Kingdom of God.

IN ADDITION to the bare statement of the desirability of his removal from among his disciples, Jesus helps us to an appreciation of its certainty by giving a reason for the action: ". . . For if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you." That this was a great and sufficient cause in the mind of Jesus for his departure is apparent. While the force of this reason may not readily be felt, yet it may be made to grow upon us. This is the way in which to reap its benefits. It must be considered, viewed on all sides, studied, prayed over, before it can be so apprehended as to be appropriated.

One of the results of earnest desire in this direction is an ever-increasing conviction of spirit, which imparts a feeling of harmony with the assertion of Jesus, enabling us to glimpse how the development of the Kingdom of heaven is contingent on the procedure the Lord outlined. For he goes on at once to state the work of the Spirit, in a brief but broad way which makes the salient features put before us startlingly impressive. The operation of the Spirit would be revealed by showing the world, in a convincing and convicting manner, the sin of rejecting a Saviour whom God commanded men to accept: "for sin is the transgression (breaking) of the law (commandment of God)." He would also convince the world of righteousness, because Jesus proved his righteousness by going to the Father, where only the righteous can go, adding thus to the weight of the reason why he should be believed on. The Holy Spirit would also show to the world that judgment had been rendered against Satan as the murderer of human life by the death of the innocent One, and condemned in that judgment by means of the resurrection—"having despoiled principalities . . . triumphing over them in it," that is, in the power of his resurrection. Here, then, is a necessary world-wide work to be done, which, Jesus clearly teaches, belongs to the Spirit and which cannot be rendered until the Son of man goes to his Father.

IT IS also by the operation of the Holy Spirit that Jesus, "at the right hand of God," assumes the Captaincy of that marvelous divine undertaking which is to terminate in the kingdoms of this world becoming the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ. It is the only method whereby he can bestow universal assistance, and whereby he can be with us, in a real sense, "alway, even unto the end of the age." This unveils the expediency of the Ascension in its relation to the individual. Not only can he and does he, from his exalted position, direct the great social and political changes out of which his Kingdom is evolving, but you and I may receive his aid at the same time in the affairs of our daily life, lowly, yet important to us. The following statement (and context), "For if the ministration of condemnation (the law of Moses) hath glory, much rather doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory," shows the world-wide sweep and permanence of the developing Kingdom; yet we know that this includes all necessary care and loving consideration for you and me.

For our Saviour is the Master indeed of details! Warning his immediate disciples of the troublous times impending at the destruction of Jerusalem, he at the same time comforts them: "But there shall not an hair of your head perish. In your patience possess ye your souls." And the same strengthening assurance is for us in these troublous days, since in his last prayer for his followers he says, "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word." So from the vantage ground of his ascension he ministers to his own in Europe, Asia, Africa and America, as he never could if localized in a body on earth. Through his Spirit, to each of his thousands of disciples he brings comfort, direction, hope, at the same moment. This would manifestly be impossible, were he where but one at a time could consult with him.

ONE of the great objects of the Christian's life on earth—the reason why, when one becomes a Christian, he is not immediately removed to the heavenly sphere—is to secure for him such discipline and development as shall the better fit him for the life to come. He is to learn obedience and the ability to accomplish, when given his share of work in the vineyard of his Lord. The parable of the talents and the pounds, as well as many others, clearly shows this. Besides, the Christian's supreme work, to "make disciples of all nations," involves the highest and severest use of all his powers. The sustaining grace sufficient for him to undertake and carry forward this great endeavor is found in the promise "Lo, I am with you alway." Were he here in the body, not one of us would move out to such a stupendous enterprise without trying to consult him personally. We should deem his advice on this, that and the other phase of our contemplated activity absolutely essential. With all Christians thus trying to speak to him, our individual turn could scarcely come in a lifetime: hence there would be no movement, no real endeavor on our part, consequently no development of our powers. All personal initiative would be paralyzed, lest we make a mistake.

This inevitably would lead to the decay of faith, for, under such conditions, its exercise could be almost lost. No matter how much confidence is reposed in the Lord, the disuse of faith, the failure to exercise it, soon converts it into a "faith without works, which is dead." But as it is now, in the wisdom of our ascended Lord, he has left us general instructions for doing specific work; and the method is indicated by great principles whose application is left to us, under the Holy Spirit's guidance. To secure this direction calls for a quickened life, mental and spiritual. Hence, prevailing prayer is followed by joyful procedure. Every element of our character is alive to the Spirit's influence, and under the exercise of it, as obedient children, we grow toward "the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

A STRIKING benefit of our Lord's absence is very clearly seen in the earnest study given to learn his will as revealed in the record of his life and teachings written for our guidance by men under the power of the Holy Spirit. Were he here with us, and the New Testament in our hands as now, always there would be the inclination to ask him the meaning of his commandments, rather than waste time (as we should probably think it) in trying to find out for ourselves. Now we are obliged to give careful, prayerful and prolonged attention to his instructions. This enriches our lives in a way which ought to be recognized and appreciated to a greater extent than it is. It causes a longing and reaching out after the Spirit's quickening, which greatly enlarges our capacity to receive. The teacher who leaves his pupils to solve intricate problems for themselves under his general direction, does them a greater benefit than he who at once reveals the process. So the divine Teacher gives us our problems to solve by the exercise of all our powers, promising that, as we proceed in earnest, honest effort, the Comforter will guide us into all truth.

Again, the manner of the Ascension forms a bridge between heaven and earth unlike and better than any other. And some such connection between earth and heaven, time and eternity, has always been dreamed of and longed for by humanity. Here we have its realization as an actual event, coupled with the promise of a return, the similitude of which never was conceived of by mortal imagination. The Lord's statement that it was expedient for him to go away presented a fact difficult enough for the early disciples to take in, even with explanations of what that action would bring to pass for them; but had he simply failed to come back some time when he apparently left them temporarily, at the close of the forty days' appearances (as he evidently had been in the habit of doing during this period), there would have been a vagueness about his absence which could not have failed to produce a sort of uneasiness as to the reality of his having gone to the Father, his ministry as Intercessor, and his promise to return. But the fashion of his going was practically a physical demonstration of the certainty of his return. With their natural eyes they had seen him in the humiliation of the cross; with their natural eyes they saw him rising toward heaven in a cloud of glory. Then followed the assurance from heavenly messengers that his return would be just as plainly evident, a real occurrence. Surely that day heaven and earth must have been but a step apart!

For us, as well as for the first disciples, the coming of Jesus again seems more of a possibility because of the manner of the Ascension. It is taken out of the realm of the mystical and visionary, and put into the practical, which accords with the idea of a reign on earth. Hence his reappearance assumes a different aspect in our thought because of this character of his disappearance. His Ascension was real, personal, physical, visible—it was expedient that it be so—and his coming again will be "in like manner," and "every eye shall see him." We can feel, with a peculiarly impressive conviction, that he still lives, because he was alive when he went away. Therefore heaven should seem nearer to us daily, because of the way in which the Ascension illustrates the method of the return.

HERE, then, is the final great incentive to faithfulness. Jesus' Ascension has not left us comfortless, because the Comforter has come to sustain us in our service, stimulate us in our activities, strengthen us in our times of weakness (who has not had them?), and, in the midnight watches of the soul, verifies the Saviour's statement, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you. Not as the world giveth give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.

"And this is not all. The toil, the sorrow borne, the hope are to have a fruitage beyond, just over on the other side of the grace which now sustains us. "In patience possess ye your souls." Why? "I will come again and receive you unto myself."

But can such a thing really occur? The greatest reformers die, and all we ever hope from them is the continuing influence of their examples and precepts. Not so with Jesus. He did not die when he left the world. His departure was absolutely different in kind from that of any other. The influence of his life and teaching does indeed remain, And it increases. But he himself is coming to bring to consummation what we have been trying to do in his name. "This same Jesus who was received up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye beheld him going into heaven."

Thus is the apostle's statement intensified and illuminated: "Your labor is not in vain in the Lord," by the fact that we "shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Yes, it was expedient for us that he "go away," for without it there could not have been the daily stirring of that "blessed hope," "till he come," than which a greater incentive to faithfulness cannot be conceived.

The Germany of Tomorrow

By NEVIN O. WINTER

MR. WINTER, an American scholar who has traveled much in Germany and studied its institutions and the spirit of its people, interprets present conditions during the disintegrating process. Did German dread of Social-Democratic success precipitate the war?

ONE of the striking features of the Tiergarten, the famous park in the very heart of Berlin, is a long row of thirty-two statues of former Prussian rulers of the Hohenzollern family. Nearly all are represented as warriors, a striking revelation of the bent of that ambitious dynasty. Beginning with the small province now known as East Prussia, with Königsberg as its capital, Prussia expanded her boundaries until she covered more territory than the other twenty-five units composing the German Empire. These accretions were generally gained by the sword. Sweden, Russia, Poland, Austria, Denmark and France were the victims, as well as many smaller German states and principalities, for Prussia in her aggrandizement respected neither nationality nor race.

When in Germany, not many months prior to the outbreak of the war, I found the increase of the spirit of militarism was most noticeable over what I had observed in my previous visits. The martial air pervaded the atmosphere everywhere. Signs of military preparations were omnipresent. These signs were naturally more noticeable in Berlin than anywhere else. Prussian officers walked the streets like privileged beings, while the men on parade dropped into the "goose step" with alacrity when occasion demanded. The ordinary human was of no consequence, and it was not difficult for me to credit the tales of cruelty and inhumanity charged to them in Belgium and France.

As an antithetical picture, it is with pleasure that I recall my journeys across other sections of Germany and my visits to many of the smaller cities. There was a prevailing atmosphere of cheerfulness, content and simple happiness. The deepest impression was that of a substantial, industrious and economical people. In the early morning a stream of men, women and children would be seen proceeding from the villages out to the surrounding fields to begin the day's work. There was no evidence that these peasant Germans either anticipated or would welcome the struggle that followed.

AND now—what of the future of Germany? Will she remain one great and united state? The only bond of cohesion has been language and blood, but the blood composition varies, and there are dialectical differences as well. The influence of tradition and history adds a repellant rather than attractive force. The Thirty Years' War (1618-1648) was fought principally among German states and left lasting enmities. A goodly share of the empire was long a part and parcel of the Holy Roman Empire under the Hapsburgs. Even so late as 1866, during the Seven Weeks' War—as the struggle between Prussia and Italy on one side and Austria on the other is called—the kingdoms of Bavaria, Saxony and Württemberg, as well as several of the smaller states, placed their forces at the disposal of Austria. When Austria begged for peace, Prussia levied indemnities amounting to millions of dollars against the recalcitrant states, which did not increase the good will with which they regarded their domineering neighbor. Hence it was, too, that it required coercion as well as coaxing to construct the German Empire.

The pride in the glory and belief in the invincibility of German arms has been dissipated. The national arrogance of the Prussian has also left its sting. There is great possibility that even the removal of all German kings and ruling princes, and the establishment of absolute democracy, will not entirely dissipate the existing friction. Since it was a successful war and a strong military power that consolidated the German states, an unsuccessful war and the failure of a strong military power may produce permanent disintegration.

BAVARIA is, after Prussia, the strongest and most independent unit in the present federation. She has long aspired to leadership among the German states. She did not unite her fortunes with the Hohenzollerns until France had been defeated, and even then the majority for union was very small in her legislative body. She also reserved many special privileges. Furthermore, the fortunes of the Bavarians were so long linked with Teutonic Austria that if they do not stand out alone they are just as likely to turn toward Vienna as toward Berlin.

Religion is a strong tie, for the Bavarians and Austro-Germans are intensely Catholic, while Berlin is the center of Protestant Germany. With Austria disintegrated along racial lines, the German state of some ten million inhabitants, with Vienna as its capital, may become a part of the German republic. If these should unite with a Germany stripped of her plunder of the past century and a half, such a union would make amends to some extent for the loss of Alsace-Lorraine, the Polish provinces, and the Danish part of Schleswig-Holstein.

The three free cities of Hamburg, Bremen and Lübeck occupied a unique position in the German Confederation. Although part of an imperial monarchy, these cities are essentially republican. Each controls territory outside the municipality which gives its name to the state. These cities would form a splendid nucleus for a representative and republican form of government.

IN GERMANY, practically all who have been anti-monarchical were members of the Social-Democratic Party. There are hundreds of thousands of bankers, merchants, doctors, lawyers and teachers who voted the Social-Democratic ticket, simply because it was the only party which has unceasingly opposed the imperial government and contended for real parliamentary representation.

There are some twenty political parties recognized in Germany. Among these the imperial government drew its principal support from the Conservatives (two or three groups) and the Center (Catholic) party. The Center has been kept together as a protection against the great Protestant majority. The so-called Liberal Party would be classed by us as conservative, because it has generally espoused only such reforms as were favored by the government. The Social-Democratic party has outgrown the narrow ideas upon which it was founded half a century ago. It is still primarily the labor party. Its leaders have generally been talented and level-headed, but it is made up of all sorts and conditions of men and is symptomatic of deep-seated, popular discontent. Although the Kaiser classed them as "enemies of the divine order of things," and many obstacles were thrown in their way, the Social-Democrats in 1912, at the last Reichstag election, polled more than one-third of the votes cast. The three strictly government parties polled only a few more.

It is impossible absolutely to measure the forces of the currents and cross-currents now sweeping over Germany. Demobilization is not complete, and the people have not found themselves. The Social-Democrats will undoubtedly split into different groups, now that the enemy-in-chief has disappeared. One of the best organized groups, certainly the most aggressive one, is that composed of extreme radicals led by Liebknecht and his followers, so recently defeated in their attempt to seize the government. It must be admitted that hunger, poverty and a hopeless industrial future for Germany would be powerful allies for Bolshevist agitators. I cannot believe, however, that anything approaching Bolsh will ever spread over Germany, did over Russia. The Russian pe had the socialistic commune, an made them welcome Bolshevis it was practically the same applied to the state. Furthermor leaders promised them all the la the aristocracy, and land was they wanted. It is indeed a di matter to steer a country throu period during which there is no e tive head, as is the case in Ger today, for the ruling cabinet sca knows how to enforce its decrees.

It seems improbable that a p who have been accustomed to or ness and industrial as well as efficiency should dissolve thems into practical anarchy, such as shevism means. All of these ad tages would be absolutely threat by such chimerical theories as t advanced by the extreme radi Even the German mind will cert be able to perceive the weakne their program. Furthermore, the mans have almost universal educa as against Russia's eighty-five per of illiteracy.

THE Germany of the futur destined to be an industrial many, whether empire or repu whether one state or many, just has been in the past. In no o way can seventy millions of pe exist within confines that a si state of our Union might env The only other alternative would the migration of twenty or th millions of Germans to other la German sagacity, even though in m things absolutely unscrupulous, constructed a great trade mach I have had visual demonstration this many times. I have seen German merchants and German sh encircled the globe. These great org izing powers still exist, and it undoubtedly be their first effort recover as much of this trade as sible. This will require order efficiency as well as a government t commands respect abroad. Theref it seems reasonable to anticipate tha fairly conservative government arise before long, which will sec the support of the people.

A republic is most probable, bu limited monarchy is always a p sibility. Much educational work al that line had been done by the Soci Democrats prior to the war. In fa many of those who are qualified speak believe that it was the dread the success of the Social-Democr and the overthrow of the monarc that precipitated the struggle wh has proved fatal to Teutonic ambiti of aggrandizement.

The Defense of High-Mindedness

SUNDAY, February 16. Col. 3:2. "Set your mind on the things that are above." This is one of the very valuable changes in the Revised Version. "Set your affection" is changed into " your mind." The old version fixed our attention noods: the new version fixes our attention on the le in which the moods are to be created. One s us to the mental preparatives in which a deep saving sentiment is born. It begins with the r-courses. The other takes us to the hills where rivers have their springs. Jesus and Nathanael

MONDAY, February 17. John 1:48. "Nathanael saith unto him, Whence knowest thou me? us answered and said unto him, Before that Philip ed thee, when thou wast under the fig tree, I saw ." There still lives in a Southern city an aged who was once a school teacher and who had ng his scholars a boy whose name has become ous as one of the great military leaders in the sent world war. Some one asked the old school- ter, "Did you suspect that boy would ever be so t?" He meditated a moment and replied, "I had means of knowing that he would be great, but I w he had it in him to do anything he undertook lo." Perhaps no faithful teacher is without his phetic visions of the future possibilities of certain his scholars. That imaginative boy may be a t; that sentimental girl may be an artist; that ctical boy with a genius for mathematics may be a chant; that mischievous lad, so fond of mechani- toys, may be an inventor. The eyes of love see y far into the future. It was so with the Master. had his eyes on Nathanael. Our Prayers Are Heard

TUESDAY, February 18. Luke 11:10. "Every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." After urging perseverance in prayer the Lord now speaks in a striking climax of the certainty of being heard. Asking, seeking, knocking, represent the redoubled and increasing efforts which we make to reach the ear and heart of God. Our God has said that he is a God who permits himself to be entreated. He has had recorded in his Holy Book examples of the saints which show him in conflict with praying faith and ultimately overcome by it. In telling us this he condescends to the level of our human conceptions: it is the best way he could have chosen for making us understand that his heart is really teeming with love and affection for his dear children, and that we must not interpret his seeming harshness as real unwillingness or hardness of heart on his part. He is not inexorable, no matter how much he seems to be so. "O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come"—thus Isaiah addressed him. That was a true way of characterizing God: the One that hears prayer. It is one of his blessed attributes. Over and against the reasonable disputations of philosophers who declare praying an act of unwisdom let us understand and never forget that it is the very highest wisdom; that prayer is in no case in vain. Our little children who come frankly and pleadingly before us with their requests are really great philosophers: theirs is the philosophy, not of coldly reasoning logic, but of a trustful heart. Their requests may at times perplex us, even weary us, but would we have them otherwise? Certainly not. The moment they become skeptic of our paternal relation to them, the beautiful filial relation in which they stand to us is destroyed.

Gentleness and Greatness

WEDNESDAY, February 19. Ps. 18:35. "Thy gentleness hath made me great." Gentleness is an element of all true greatness; it is a power which makes for successful leadership and statesmanship. It is Christ mellowing with spiritual tenderness the hearts of men. George Washington in a large degree possessed this characteristic. He had to fall before the world could measure his greatness, and rise again in the hearts of humanity before they could properly estimate his genius. He is the first typical American, reflecting majesty, goodness, leadership and gentleness. His modesty equaled his valor; his wisdom stood alongside his doing justly, loving mercy and walking humbly with his God.

Washington, like Grant, was a silent man, whom some thought cold, austere and aristocratic; but his was the solitude of greatness, planning for the future of his country, knowing that a single battle might decide its destiny. After victory had crowned the seven years' struggle, he wrote to a friend, "I feel myself eased of the load of public care; I hope to spend the remainder of my days cultivating the affections of good men and in the practice of the domestic virtues." But the American people needed him and called him to a still higher position as President of the Republic.

Choosing God for Others

THURSDAY, February 20. Joshua 24:15. "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." The personal note is here, and it is dominant, for the Bible is the most individualistic book in the world. Joshua is an independent thinker. He chooses for himself. He knows he has the power of choice and the right of choice and the duty of choice. But he strikes another note, the social note. He makes choice of God for others than himself. The family is the organic basis of society. He chooses God for his house. A man may speak for others than himself. A father may be a high priest to his family, and a mother a high priestess—but they must be worthy of a spiritual priesthood. In the broad relations of life one may speak for many, for it is true that "no life can be pure in its purpose and strong in its strife and all life not be purer and stronger thereby." Such are the laws that govern personal influence that it is true that no one of us ever chooses for himself to serve the Lord who does not by that act, and by what follows it, help some other life to make a similar choice.

A college student confessed that he had been moved to a desire to follow Christ by the way a certain other student walked across the campus. Another man testifies that the deepest religious impression of his life was due to his watching the old gray head of a venerable man, an elder in the church, who sat just in front of him on Sunday. As a child he used to see that head bowed in prayer, and sometimes he thought more about it than about the prayer. The child knew that man was a servant of God, a highly honored and much beloved man in the community, and there was born in him a deep desire to be as good and noble as he, when he grew up to be a man. We choose for unknown friends when we choose for ourselves. God is the great First Cause, but our lives are effective secondary agencies in hastening the coming of his kingdom. But first we must be in right relation to that Cause. If our lives are nothing without him, with him, at his side, our lives are like a string of ciphers following a figure, and the figure is the Eternal One.

Perseverance in Prayer

FRIDAY, February 21. Luke 11:8. "Though he will not rise and give him, because he is his friend, yet because of his importunity he will rise and give him as many as he needeth." These are the concluding words of the little story which the Lord related to his disciples to illustrate the value of being unwearied and persevering in prayer. Some one had gone to his friend's house to ask for three loaves of bread that he might entertain a guest who had unexpectedly arrived. The friend had already retired and asked not to be troubled, but his late caller persisted that he must get this help, with the result indicated in our text.

Our prayers are prompted by faith in God's unlimited resources to supply our needs and in his ever ready willingness to succor us. But the petitions which we address to him are not infrequently turned into tests of that faith which prompted them. There are delays in the answer; there may even be apparent refusals. What are we to do? The situation is becoming humiliating to us. Nobody likes to trouble an unwilling giver. We are afraid of appearing impudent, immodest. But the question is "What can we do?" rather than "What shall we do?" It is assumed that our request was prompted by a need that could not be supplied by ourselves nor from any other human source. For otherwise we should not have asked. That being the case, there remains but one thing to do for the consistent believer: if he was not ashamed to come before God with his petition in the first place, there is no reason why he should be ashamed of continuing his request as long as his need continues. The delays of our heavenly Father in hearing our prayers are simply tests of our endurance. We may feel that we are unseasonable in submitting our requests and that we are pushing them with an importunity that might irritate; but that is the only course left open to us.

Steadfastness

SATURDAY, February 22. I. Cor. 15:58. "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." We have nothing to do with dying, but everything with living. Death is only a physical incident, like the changing of cars, over in the twinkling of an eye. Life and living forever are mighty themes. Not that you may die tonight, but that you may have "one more day's work for Jesus"; to be or not to be a steadfast, abounding worker in Christ's kingdom, that is the question that decides destiny. As God took care of your coming into this world, so he will with your going out. What you will do while here is of infinite importance. Is your body a temple of the Holy Spirit? Have your hands grappled with the work given you to do? Have you had the mind that was in Christ—the mind to work, to love, to suffer and to achieve?

Those who believe only in the present life say, "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die." But the follower of Christ exclaims, "Let us finish the work given us to do, for tomorrow we live forevermore!" Without a hope of the future, what is the use of living, climbing, struggling, when dying is so soon? Life is the testing-time, the dressing-room for the scenes of immortal achievement. If we believed that Jesus would come tomorrow, we should not stand today lazily looking for his glory, but, as John Wesley said, "I would fill all my appointments today if I knew he was coming tomorrow."

Men of age and of wealth often retire from activity, but there is no such provision in God's realm.

Grandmother and Girl

"I READ a book many years ago, called 'The Fixed Period.' It told of a community that decided to kill off all old men and women when they arrived at a fixed period.

"The plan worked badly, if I remember the tale aright.

"I was a middle-aged woman with my children about my knees, then, and the notion did not appeal to my sense of right. Now that I have passed the boundary line of threescore and ten, I find myself wondering if the idea may not have been sensible and humane. I make my home with my married daughter. She has three daughters, all fine young people and college-bred. Their father is wealthy and supports the girls—aged from eighteen to twenty-four.

"Their mother runs the house and has an eye to the girls' dress. They don't need her in any other way. They 'know it all,' so far as knowledge of the world and everything in it is concerned. As for me, I am just a figurehead—and not a sightly one at that. I am reminded many times a day of how far behind the times I am in everything pertaining to education, social usages, politics, religion—in fact, every subject in which intelligent people are interested. They patronize me and try sometimes to instruct me. Maybe I ought to submit patiently, as to a part of the discipline of life. But I rebel in my soul, and twenty times a day wish I was out of the world.

"If the Fixed Period were what the Bible gives as the natural date, I should have been out of the way four years ago.

"My daughter is very kind to me and naturally thinks her children treat me well, and I don't undeceive her. But will you tell me of what use an old grandmother, situated as I am, is in God's world? Please tell me plainly as if we were sitting together for a twilight talk in the Comfort Corner.

"HANNAH L. (Connecticut)."

I insert your letter in full the more willingly because other elderly women—mothers and grandmothers—have written to me in a like strain. One says bitterly: "The Fifth Commandment might as well be left out of the Decalogue for all the effect it has upon the Girl of the Present Day." Being so fortunate as to number among my friends and chosen associates a number of charming girls, who seem to be sincere in seeking my companionship, and from whom I learn much that makes this good world of ours more lovely and more deserving of the title you give it—"God's World"—I cannot subscribe to my correspondent's assertion.

I have said that I learn much from my girl intimates. They please me by saying that they profit by our long talks. And I believe them! You and I have lived to little purpose if we have not accumulated stores of knowledge of the life that now is, and wisdom concerning that which is to carry this on into the "perfect day" of which earthly existence is but twilight. We have had rich and varied experiences that come with length of days and not with present "observation" to the young. If we have rightly used our allotted period we hold the key of a magazine of treasures we have no right to hoard in uselessness.

At the outset, make friends of those who you say assume to be your teachers. Let them see that you would like to partake of the wealth gained by college-breeding. This marvelous age of ours has moved fast and far in the three-quarters of a century that has whirled on since you were born. It would be strange—monstrous—if your girl had not kept pace with the revelations and revolutions that have come about in her generation. Give her to understand that you do not wish to be left behind. What you have to impart in return has the richness of old wine by comparison with that which she pours out for you. If she be as intelligent as your granddaughter should be, she will appreciate the fact. I once heard a bright girl quote in this connection the noted saying of Marie Stuart: "Tradition is the elder sister of History"—adding with a grateful smile, "Your juniors are helping to make history. Our seniors can commit to us the true riches of Auld Lang Syne."

You say, "They know it all!" Do not bring rudely to their consciousness the cruel truth that they will know less as they gain in judgment and in years. When you can study with them ask leave to do this. Admit frankly, but not shamefacedly, that the curriculum of scholastic education was different in your youth from what they have enjoyed, and express admiration of the change. Above all, do not disparage any branch of study which commends itself to your ripe judgment as unimportant. If it be worthless, or worse than useless, trust to time and a broader, deeper estimate of values to open their eyes and minds to the truth.

Yes! I recollect Trollope's clever book, "The Fixed Period," and that, as you say, the experiment was a failure. The plain truth is that the period at which human usefulness ends is variable beyond the computation of human sages. One man lays down trowel or pen, and stamps "Finis" upon the record of his career of active servi fifty. His neighbor stands in his appointed lot until his great-gran dren arise and call him blessed.

You have asked me to speak pl Some day, if God will, I shall hav talk with the Girl. Now my erra to you as the representative of a which I wish were smaller, and amenable to reason. Your chirogr and mode of expression prove yo be no illiterate "nuisance" in a where the girls are college-bred an appointments are in accordance the possession of liberal means.

If your morbid misconception o situation has already built a ba between you and those who "pat ize" you, make it your business to dermine it. Prove your affectionat terest in them and all that conc them by ministering to their wants entering cheerfully into their talk daily pursuits. The effort this cost you is excellent practice of the ond Great Commandment. You sadly to the "discipline of life." never more wholesome than when "rebel in our souls" against the cial form the Father wills that it s take. In that same rebellious soul, are convinced that you are wiser in that makes life worth living than conceited juniors whose patronage t temper and patience. Do you recol the admonition of the good rector Bulwer's "My Novel" to his par ioners—"O ye poor! I exhort you be charitable to the rich!"

It came to my mind in reading y letter, and has lingered with me e since. Granted that you are as far hind the age in which we live as y erudite Girl believes us to be, ma allowances for her self-confidence a the compassion for you engendered it. "Give her time" and be charita to her while she is waiting for later dev opments. You will lose what hold y may have upon her by scolding or l turing her. Certain wise grandpare of an earlier generation than yours mine put into a homely adage what I trying to tell you in this Twilight Talk

"Gray heads do not grow upon gre shoulders."

And while learning to be charital with those who ignore the time-wo saying, reflect that there is no dispari between the hoary head and the you heart. It is your part to lessen the d tance that divides you from your G by keeping yourself young in so mind, spirit and heart.

Our Girl is cordially invited to tell her side of the question. Addresses a confidential, and the Comfort Corn like—

"The golden gates of Gospel grace—Stands open night and day."

The Common People

THE finest folk in the world to preach to come from the ordinary walks of life—people who know enough to have wisdom, but who have never, by education or environment, been pushed out of the big lump of humanity that makes the world not only a safe place to live in but a good place, where plenty of joy and peace abound.

I lately had a rich experience, while riding in the day coach of a fast train. In through the door, taking a seat beside me, came a railway tie!

"If you don't mind, parson, I'll sit down here; for I have a thing or two I want to say to some one like you. You may think I have a wooden head, for I look it, all over. But listen: if it were not for me and others like me, you would not be here; the locomotive, engineer, conductor, cars, steel rails and all would go to the scrap-heap, but for the work we do. Nobody thinks about us or hands out a word of appreciation. As near as we get to the touch of human sympathy is when some hoboes put their feet on us; but be that as it may, we go right on doing our duty, unknown, unhonored and unsung. But all your war and commerce and food supplies for such great towns as you come from is dependent on us.

"Now and then," the voice went on, "some college rube calls us 'sleepers'; but there would be no night runs with thousands well bunked and all peacefully dreaming, at sixty miles an hour, except we down on the roadbed did our work and did it well.

"You have your troubles, no doubt, for at the present hour a preacher is considered, like the bridegroom at a wedding, a necessary nuisance; but for real burden-bearing and sacrifice, we rate close on to one hundred per cent. They never consult us whether we are to carry pigs or people. Coal and corncobs, milk and milkmaids, all kodak alike to us. To top off our crucifixion by ax and saw, they drive big spikes in us to hold down the rails and fishplates, and that hurts a heap more than the pins of criticism they stick in you over your pulpit and other work. When worn out and through, you go to heaven. We go to—we go to—why! they burn us!

"The next time you preach, just tell the congregation that common people do most uncommon things, just like One who, we are told, went about doi good."

And would you believe it? that rai way tie jumped right out through th window that was closed, and nev broke the glass. And as we passed on saw farmers at work and took off m hat to them.

The Bible and the Soldier

THE Bible, especially the New Testament, has won even a securer grip in the affections of en in service as a result of the war. writer spent seven months in is training-camps in the United s, and had opportunity to observe eneral use of the Bible and New ment. There was hardly a locker did not at least have a New ment. The best part of it was he Bibles and Testaments were not in the lockers. They were con- d as much a part of the soldier's ment as his helmet or rifle.

eligion" was one of the stock cts at these impromptu forums. strange and perhaps unorthodox of things pertaining to one's ations were advanced; yet the discussion was an attestation that ien had not forgotten God. Tes- nts and Bibles were flashed as arly as legal tomes in court pro- e. Our learned theologians might t to the untutored interpretation to passages of Scripture; yet even e crude manner in which the light hrown on texts there was a solidity of belief that was a welcome relief from the higher criticism of the present day. The soldier not only discussed religion as he saw it unfold about him, but he was continually grasping for the vital parts of religious experiences which could contribute to his spiritual betterment. In some of these discussions, scientific explanation of the creation has withered before the refreshing belief and trust of some uneducated youth. These students of religions in general and practitioners of none, found the sledding rough at times. The resurrection, the divinity of Christ, the new life, baptism and the hereafter were discussed pro and con.

St. Paul, with the exception of Christ, was the most discussed and admired character in the Bible. The thing in Paul's life which appealed to the men was that he had proved himself man enough to admit his mistake, and, facing straight around, redeemed himself by righteous living. "He was a regular guy," as a New York shoeshiner said.

Besides being used to these discussions, Bibles were read regularly. A poll of a barrack-room full of men reading Bibles, as to why they were reading them, revealed such answers as:

"I always did it, and don't feel right if I don't."

"Promised mother I'd not neglect it."

"Best way to kill time."

"Feel like a piker if I don't."

"Good way to find out what's the matter with you.".

Among the popular portions were the Sermon on the Mount, the trial and crucifixion of Christ, the story of Lazarus, Revelation, First Corinthians, Acts, the stoning of Stephen, and the conversion of Saul. Ruth was a popular book in the Old Testament, because, as one soldier said, "It is the best love story in literature."

You can serve ten breakfasts of Quaker Oats for the cost of one average meat breakfast with the same energy value.

Each 32-cent package served in place of such foods saves you about $3. Yet the costly foods do not compare with Quaker Oats as food.

The oat is the greatest food that grows. It is almost a complete food—close to the ideal food.

As a vim-food and a food for growth it has an age-old fame.

No other breakfast costs so little—none feeds your folks so well.

Moses Praying for Israel

International Sunday School Lesson for February 23

Ex. 32 : 1 to 34 : 9

The Price of Spiritual Leadership

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

IN THIS lesson we see Moses wrestling with God in prevailing prayer after his great disappointment in the sin of the Hebrew people. We learn that every one who is to any extent a spiritual leader must, like Jesus himself, go through his Gethsemane, and even suffer betrayal at the hands of those whom he most wishes to serve. Every true father or mother knows the sorrows of redeeming love, as does every true pastor and shepherd-like teacher; and all these, like Moses, must be strong in the ministry of intercession. If they can pray unceasingly for those whom they would save, pleading with God, learning of him the wise and right course toward the endangered ones, invincible love will win the victory—now as of old.

Moses would not let his people go their own foolish and wicked way. Christ would let no one snatch his disciples out of his hand. Each echoes the spirit of the heavenly Father, "How can I give thee up, O Ephraim?" The true spiritual leader shares "the love that will not let us go."

"As for this Moses"

It is not only republics that are ungrateful. All men forget too easily those who have served them. Mother's sacrifices are not remembered by the prosperous son. The doctor's all-night vigil doesn't linger in the memory of the patient whose life he saved. And how many patriots and leaders have been forgotten, like Moses as soon as his back was turned in our chapter here! To the later Jews he stood out as a colossus, almost a demi-god; but in his lifetime he was unappreciated, maligned, plotted against, and constantly disobeyed. It seems so hard for men to see God in their contemporaries! Centuries afterward the descendants of these Israelites failed to appreciate the Son of God, saying, in words like those of their ancestors, "We know that God spake unto Moses, but as for this man, we know not whence he is."

An element in the heavy price of spiritual leadership is in this speedy neglect of the deliverer. Jesus lamented over the multitudes of Jerusalem whom he would fain have gathered as a hen gathers her chickens, but they would not. Only prayer can carry the leaders of the spirit through, despite human blindness and folly. They turn to God.

Aaron the Disappointing

How hard it sometimes seems to find loyal and steadfast helpers in the work of the Lord, lieutenants who need not to be watched by their Captain! Jesus made Peter his associate, yet again and again Peter grieved the Master deeply, as indeed did all the others. During Jesus' lifetime their assistance was very disappointing. So it was with Aaron, Moses' second in command, his own brother. Here he weakly yields to the erring people, doing whatever they plan instead of compelling their loyalty to the divine commandments. Later we see him jealous of his chief, and with Miriam murmuring against his preeminence.

It is pretty hard to see your subordinates clouding the ideals of your leadership. Washington and Lincoln knew the bitterness of this. So in lesser degree does every leader in Christian work. It cuts to the heart to have your representatives compromising on vital issues. Are we thus disappointing our Master? Are we even proving unfaithful to those who have relied upon us to bear a share in the teaching of the children, the administration of the affairs of the local church? How often Aaron failed to hold up Moses' hands in critical times of need!

The Golden Calf

Aaron offered lame excuses for his sin in fashioning the idol of gold. He told a lie when he said he cast gold in the fire and it came out a calf! We don't get our false gods by mere chance. They are due to our deliberate folly, our foolish imitation of others, or our blind selfishness of soul. He might better have adopted the excuses of his modern defenders—the calf was a representation of Jehovah, it was familiar from the Apis-worship in Egypt, etc. But it was in flat violation of the second commandment if not of the first. And its whole tendency was bad, leading to superstition, to unseemly rites and dances, to dependence on things seen instead of the Unseen Guide.

After all, the Israelites were only doing what others had done! The rich and luxurious Egyptians worshiped God in this form, so why not they? "Let the well-to-do people of any nation preach, for example, the gospel of materialism; let them say by their actions (which speak louder than prayers) that big dinners and fine clothing, palatial homes and costly entertainments, expensive yachts and high-priced automobiles, are the main things in life; let them say, "These be the gods which bring us up in happiness and peace"—and slowly but surely the toiling people will also be materialized. There are, alas, still many thoughtless worshipers of the golden calf. No matter who set up the false ideal, all are sharers in the guilt—"they made the calf which Aaron made."

Moses' Anger

What a splendid picture we have of Moses the meek, coming down the mountain-side and catching sight of the half-naked dancers around the degrading image! He was furiously indignant, horror-stricken. We can see him dashing into the midst, sobering the revelers with his terrible wrath, smashing the idol to fragments, and crying, "Whoso is on the Lord's side, let him come unto me!"

> "God give us angry men in every age,
> Men with indignant hearts at sight of wrong."

We are too apt to palliate iniquities, to try to be broad-minded and tolerant of people's sins and arrogances. But the prophet of God sees their social consequences and their vital danger to the soul of the nation. If he be an Amos he denounces piled-up wealth and indulgent ease. If he be a John the Baptist he startles all classes with his terrible indictments. The indignant protest of God's man is a mark of moral power and a token of his leadership. It is the correlative of the very love he feels so fervently for the people whom he so scathingly rebukes. If he did not care for them he would not be so mightily stirred.

We need ever the determined leaders, great and small, who feel keenly enough on the moral and spiritual issues of life to resist with all their souls the things that lower men's standards, that wean their allegiance subtly from God and truth. In the present day there are many such subtle influences at work, many false gods that attract, and the multitude fall away quickly. Though we be as meek as Moses we must dare to cry aloud to those we love when we see their feet slipping from the moral foundations.

Moses' Self-Abnegation

To Moses in his agony of prayer came the instinctive feeling that he could, if he would, let the sinners go and still keep himself in the favor of the Almighty. God can fulfil his promise of a great nation in Moses himself and destroy the sinful and erring crowd. But he instantly repudiated the suggestion. If the people were to die, Moses would die with them. He identified himself absolutely with their fate. The greatness of the man is here. It is not enough to save our own souls while others perish. The selfish idea of salvation is foreign to the teachings of the Bib unshine. "O man, with heaven r face, help me!" "And Moses t that the skin of his face shone." his face did shine as the sun."

When one of our Beginners' Department children saw the shining face of one of the assistant superintendents she said, "Teacher, there is Jesus over there."

It is a great thing to naturalize our religious life and make Christ real. This will make an atmosphere in school, class, church, home, that will help the seed, watered by prayer, to push up into a healthy stalk, spread and ripen.

6. The Sickle. How and when shall we gather the harvest? Not always can we tell by surface indications. A wise teacher can frequently discern the effect of certain lessons. The intuitions of the heart will rarely fail, however, and even blunders, where the love is real, may make for blessed results.

There are times and seasons in the school life when it is clearly advisable to thrust in the sickle. Some lesson, some special event, a series of meetings, may furnish the occasion. The Sunday before Communion is a good time. Thanksgiving, the last Sunday of the year, Palm Sunday, Children's Day—all are golden seasons in school evangelistic effort.

Mrs. S., despairing of human help for an injured spine, asks the Prayer League to unite their prayers to hers for divine aid and also for grace to bear the affliction if it be God's will.

Fifty-one ask for bodily healing for others; forty-one for self.

Thirty-two ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs.

Twenty-two ask prayer for healing of the mind.

Fifteen parents ask prayer for the conversion of their children; eleven wives, for the conversion of husbands; nine for the conversion of friends; four for the conversion of brothers; two for the conversion of fathers; one for the conversion of a nephew, and one for the conversion of a brother-in-law.

Eleven ask prayer for spiritual blessing of themselves; twelve for others; two ask prayer for their enemies; eight ask prayer to be reconciled to friends; one asks for blessing in Christian work; one for son in war, and one for the Bowery Mission.

Four ask to be delivered from the drink habit; five from the tobacco habit.

Four ask prayer for the restoration or improvement of hearing; eight for restoration or improvement of sight; one for cure of influenza.

Four ask prayer for aid in financial distress.

Prayers are asked for revivals or reform in Portage, Wis., and that the Baptist Church in that town may get a pastor; and that one who has had great influence, and is now a drinking man, may change and return to God; Gastonia, N. Be not too late. SHAKESPEARE

"Too Late!"

Sad words those—"Too Late"—for they always emphasize what might have been and should have been but was not—especially in life-insurance.

In March, 1915, a man living in Florida wrote to the POSTAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY for insurance-information, which was promptly forwarded.

As he did not reply, other letters with printed matter were sent suggesting that he protect his family by taking out a policy even though a small one. He put it off.

Finally, in October, 1918, the Company wrote him and inclosed an interesting booklet entitled: "HOW MUCH INSURANCE OUGHT I TO CARRY?" Then, after more than three years, an answer came—not from him but from his wife, who wrote:

"Your letters and your interest in my husband's insurance appreciated. He died one week ago from pneumonia without insurance and leaving two children."

Like most husbands he doubtless intended to take out a policy, but like many careless ones, he put it off until too late.

It was too late to protect his family after he was dead, or even after he was sick. There was a time he could have done it quickly and at little cost, but he waited until too late.

As the cost increases with each year's advance in age, the time for every one to insure is now, and in a company which stands for safety, service and saving—the POSTAL LIFE.

The Week in the World's News

BOLSHEVIKI DRIVE ALLIES BACK. Taking the offensive on the North Russian front Bolshevik troops, on Sunday, January 26, brought such pressure against the Allied troops at Shenkursk, southeast of Archangel, that the Allied commanders thought it wiser to withdraw their front some thirty miles to stronger positions astride the Vaga River. Bolshevik patrols were repulsed before these positions. Earlier in the week the Bolshevist forces operating in the Urals took the town of Ufa, driving back the Russian-Czecho-Slovak forces, which were unable to resist for lack of munitions. On January 27 the Allied forces retired ten miles further northward along the Vaga River. Refugees arriving from Shenkursk told of massacres in the town by the Bolsheviki, but these stories were doubted by headquarters. On January 25 the capture of Orenburg on the right bank of the Ural River by the Bolsheviki was confirmed, while on January 29 Bolshevist forces in the Ukraine were reported to have defeated the Ukrainian peasant army. Southwest of Petrograd Esthonian troops reenforced by Russians from the western front in France were reported to be driving the Bolshevists back, while in Turkestan the Bolshevist Government was reported overthrown. All the Russian factions had been reported to be wary of the Princes' Island conference proposed by the Peace Conference in Paris, and on January 30 the Anti-Bolshevist Governments were reported to have agreed to reject the plan.

Bolshevik attacks on the Allied positions on the Dvina River, southeast of Archangel, were repulsed on January 27.

MAGAZINE POSTAL RATES UNCHANGED. The House and Senate Conferees agreed on January 27 on a report to the two Houses of Congress of the War Revenue Bill. The Senate amendment repealing the zone system of second-class postal rates was bitterly opposed by the House Conferees under the lead of Representative Kitchin, and at the last minute the Senate Conferees yielded on this point. The text of the bill as agreed upon had not been made public at this writing. It was reported that the repeal of the zone rates might be gained by an amendment to the Post Office Bill.

WILSON RECOGNIZES POLAND. It was announced on January 29 that Secretary of State Lansing at the President's direction has extended full recognition to the new Polish Government, organized by Ignace Paderewski.

Following a conference of Polish and Czecho-Slovak Representatives at Paris on January 30 with a Committee of the Peace Conference it was announced that Poland and Bohemia would cease their attempts to secure the advantage of position in Silesia and that the territory in dispute would be occupied by Allied troops pending final settlement by the Peace Conference.

The American Red Cross has despatched a commission of doctors, nurses and relief workers to Poland by way of Copenhagen and Danzig. Immediate action was found to be urgent if infant and adult mortality from malnutrition and epidemic diseases, already approaching the proportions of a catastrophe, was to be stayed.

TO BAR FOREIGN LABOR. The Bennett Bill to restrict general immigration for four years was reported favorably to the House of Representatives on January 28. The bill would bar for a period of four years the immigration of European aliens to the United States, except accredited Government officials with their retinues, ministers of religion, teachers, missionaries, students, lawyers, authors, engineers, chemists, physicians, professional artists, and travelers for pleasure, business and curiosity. Permission is also provided for the admission of relatives of persons resident in the United States. The bill, sponsored by the American Federation of Labor, is expected to meet considerable opposition, some Congressmen holding that the fear of a flood of immigration is unfounded. The bill as drawn permits immigration from Canada, Mexico and Cuba.

Instead of immigration, the movement of foreigners is now toward emigration from America back home. All east-bound ship space is crowded, mostly by French and Italians. 4460 sailed from New York on February 1.

$1,250,000,000 FOR WHEAT. The Food Administration, on January 28, sent to the Senate and House Agricultural Committees a draft of a measure which proposes to appropriate $1,250,000,000 to enable the Government to carry out its guarantee of the price of $2.20 a bushel to the farmer for his 1919 wheat crop. The bill would authorize the President to use as much of this fund as might be necessary to carry out the guarantee. The Department of Agriculture estimated that the United States would have a surplus of the 1918 crop of 277,000,000 bushels, of which export demands for 233,000,000 bushels would leave 44,000,000 bushels to be held over into 1919. The 1919 crop is expected to yield a surplus of 350,000,000 bushels.

PORTUGUESE CABINET RESIGNS. With the Republican forces gaining the ascendency over the Monarchist rebellion, and with certain elements among the Republicans seeking to revive former quarrels, the Portuguese Cabinet, on January 26, resigned. The Monarchist movement was said to have reunited the stronger elements among the Republicans, political prisoners being released to join the Republican forces.

THE KAISER'S BIRTHDAY. On January 27 the sixtieth anniversary of the birthday of Wilhelm Hohenzollern was observed throughout Germany, especially in that part of the Rhineland occupied by Allied troops. Public demonstrations and the expressions of the press showed that there were still many people in Germany who were loyal to the ex-Kaiser and to the German ideals for which he stood.

STRIKES IN BRITAIN. It was estimated on January 28 that 200,000 persons were out on strike in the United Kingdom; Belfast was dark and at a standstill as a result of a general strike; miners were on strike in Nottingham; shipyards on the Clyde were practically at a standstill; the whole labor situation was in ferment. On January 29 the Nottingham miners returned to work, having won most of their demands, while the railway workers demanded a 48-hour week. Coal miners in Fifeshire, Scotland, who numbered 24,000, returned to work. The coal miners in West Scotland went out in sympathy with the Clyde shipbuilders. Some of the strikes were said to be based on a new labor policy designed to remodel trade-unionism along the lines of "direct action," the strikes being called by a younger element infected with syndicalist notions, in opposition to the orders of the elected heads of the unions. Twenty-Four Hours in Paris

WE knew you would like to be in the city on the Seine. So we sent Miss Sangster over to see the sights for all of us. Next week she tells of her journey from Bordeaux and her first day in Paris.

Next week also the story of bird life protected. Theodore Roosevelt signed the bill that set aside the first preserve where birds could live in peace. Now there are many oases in the world of hunters.

Next week, too, an intimate story in rotogravure of the life of the American colony at Jerusalem.

And more than this new features for young and old.

Vho Will Get the German Colonies?

er states. One of these would be the atinate, and another Rhenish Prussia. nce desires also to annex the basin of the Sarre River.

rance will insist that so far as the bank of the Rhine farther to the th is concerned, the Conference shall id military works of any kind.

he French bill for reparation is not complete, but it has been announced he Chamber of Deputies that it will about 66,000,000,000 francs.

he French Government does not ask a protectorate in Syria in the ordinary sense, . . . but France, on account of her traditional interests in that country, feels that she should be called upon to exercise some sort of guardianship or guidance until Syria is fully able to govern herself.

GREAT BRITAIN.—Great Britain's delegation believes that a Society of Nations is desirable and obtainable, and that it must be established by the present Peace Conference. She advances no Continental demands other than that a permanent and just peace be concluded, and that under the principle of self-determination there shall be international freedom of transit.

Great Britain proposes to take mandatory power over the German islands south of the equator for Australia and over German Southwest Africa for the Union of South Africa. She also expects to have the mandate over German East Africa, some parts of Arabia, and Mesopotamia.

ITALY.—Italy asks for the Trentino as far as the Brenner Pass, including the whole of Southern Tyrol, Trieste, Istria, Fiume, Zara, Sebenico, the larger part of the Dalmatian Islands, and the neutralizing of the others, Avlona and its hinterland; a protectorate over Albania; possession of the islands in the Ægean which were taken from Turkey in the ipolitan war, and the province of alia if France and England take territory in Asia Minor.

RUMANIA.—Rumania desires to retain possession of that portion of Russian Bessarabia . . . now in her possession. Rumania also desires Southern Dobrudja. . . .

To the westward Rumania wants to annex the Hapsburg provinces of Bukowina and Transylvania and a considerable part of the rich agricultural district of the Banat of Temesvar. It is here that the Rumanian aspirations conflict with those of Serbia which affirms that . . . she should have a large portion of the Banat as well as other sections of former Austria-Hungary adjoining old Serbia to the north to round out the proposed Jugoslav State. Both Rumania and Serbia have moved troops into the Banat to secure their claims, and French troops have established a neutral zone.

SERBIA.—Serbia's claims to take from the Hapsburg monarchy the Provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina are unopposed. The plans for the incorporation in Jugoslavia of the Hapsburg province of Croatia, except as to the coastal region of Fiume, are also considered as subject to the internal decision of the Southern Slavs.

Jugoslav and Italian aims are in sharp conflict in the settlement of the Adriatic coast problem, involving the future of Fiume and the Croatian seaboard. . . . The union of Montenegro and Serbia is both supported and opposed in Montenegro.

BULGARIA.—Bulgaria has not abandoned hope of adding extensive territories and even hopes to receive extensions in Southern Macedonia along the Ægean coast and in Thrace.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA. The new state of Czechoslovakia is carving out its territories almost entirely at the expense of the old Austria-Hungary. The old kingdom of Bohemia, Moravia, and the Slovak regions of Northern Hungary have already been incorporated into the proposed state, but there are certain conflicts with the Poles, Ruthenians, Rumanians, and Germans, as well as with the Austrians and the Magyars, because the Czechs assert that parts of German Saxony and German Silesia belong ethnographically to the new state. The new state desires expansion southward over a frontage on the Danube and over a corridor to the Adriatic.

GREECE.—Greece wishes Northern Epirus and Thrace, with the exception of Constantinople and the shores of the Bosporus and the Dardanelles. . . . Greece asks for the vilayet of Smyrna, in Asia Minor, and the former Turkish islands in the Eastern Mediterranean.

POLAND.—The Poles, with an inadequate army, are endeavoring to establish possession of disputed regions on three sides of Russian Poland and Galicia, which constitutes the nucleus of the new Polish state. The Poles desire Eastern Galicia to include Lemberg, which is in the Ukraine, and the disputed Province of Cholm, in Little Russia.

To the northeast the Poles desire to have Vilna recognized as Polish. . . . The Poles are contending against the Germans, not only for German Silesia and Posen and West Prussia as provinces populated chiefly by Poles, but also for the City of Danzig, so as to provide Poland with access to the sea.

BELGIUM.—Belgium asks that her reparation for damages wrought by Germany shall be the first lien upon German assets to the extent of at least 15,000,000,000 francs, or up to a much larger sum if Germany does not return the machinery and the materials taken from Belgium.

Belgium, which has reasserted her independence and thus emerges from her old state of neutrality, desires from Holland the left bank of the Scheldt and the peninsula of Maastricht, which protrudes into Belgian Limburg.

JAPAN.—Japan enters the Peace Conference, as Baron Makino, the senior delegate, has said, "with no territorial ambitions in China," while as for Tsing Tao, "she will hand it back to China under the terms of the notes exchanged between China and Japan in May, 1915. This is interpreted by Japan as permitting her to retain certain former German concessions on the Shantung Peninsula.

Japan desires to retain the southern Pacific islands north of the equator which formerly belonged to Germany.

CHINA.—The Chinese delegates ask to be guaranteed from foreign imperialism or aggression and desire the gradual abolition of "consular rights" and to be allowed to impose higher duties on importations. The Chinese also ask for the return of Kiao-Chau.

SWITZERLAND.—Switzerland is said to be willing to join a League of Nations if no policing of adjoining states were involved.

Switzerland desires an outlet to the sea by the Rhine, which she wishes to have declared a neutral stream.

SCANDINAVIA.—Denmark wishes to annex that part of northern Schleswig inhabited predominantly by Danes.

Norway has certain aspirations to Spitzbergen, but is not pressing them.

A strong Socialist movement in Sweden favors the union with Sweden of the Aland Islands, which are regarded by the Swedes as the naval key to Stockholm. Swedish interests in this connection are in conflict with those of Finland.

British Trade Embargo

DRASTIC import regulations covering a wide range of commodities and effective March 1 have been promulgated by the British Government for the protection of its industries during reconstruction. Commodities which may not be imported into Great Britain without special licenses embrace a wide range of important American products.

"Closer to the Almighty"

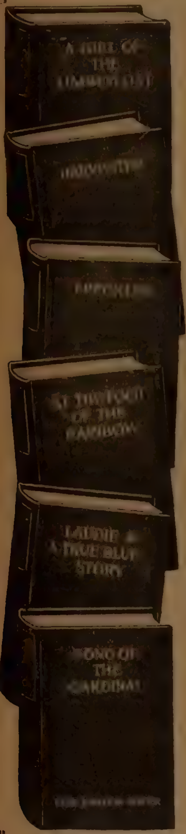
THIS is the philosophy of Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter, the author of "The Harvester," "A Girl of the Limberlost," and other marvelously successful stories—to bring those who read her books "closer to Nature and the Almighty." Mrs. Porter has opened the eyes of thousands to the wonder and glory of the world about them.

Mrs. Porter's stories all have, as a fundamental reason of their existence, the author's great love of Nature.

Through the romance of life and the delights of Nature she directs the mind upward toward the Infinite into an atmosphere that is sweet, cleansing and exalting.

In writing of "A Girl of the Limberlost," Mrs. Porter said: "This comes fairly close to my idea of a good book. The book can, and does, present a hundred pictures that will draw any reader in closer touch with Nature and the Almighty, my primal object in each line I write."

The Christian Herald has already published two editions of Mrs. Porter's novels, but they have all been taken by our readers.



Over 3,000,000 Copies of Mrs. Porter's Books Have Been Sold

ALL large book circulations come from only one cause—the recommendation of one reader to another. Mrs. Porter's novels are not only wholesome and clean, but they are romantic and cheerful. The people who live in their pages do things and accomplish tasks worth while. In the last six months of 1915 the sales of her books in the United States, England, Australia, and many other places were 625,000 copies for six months alone.

Another reason why Mrs. Porter's books have so great an appeal is that the whole family enjoy them. They are not for men, women, or children, but for all three; and an important feature is that they will be eagerly read by young people.

Rare Chance to Obtain a Special Edition of Mrs. Porter's Novels

IT is the desire of the Christian Herald to give its readers an opportunity to procure the best in literature at very reasonable cost. Of the many thousands of books which we have considered, we selected Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter's novels as the ones which should be in every Christian Herald home. Arrangements have just been completed for publishing a third special edition of six volumes of the most popular stories by this talented writer. These six volumes will be printed from the plates used in the original edition—the type being large and clear, and the paper of exceptional quality. The books are bound in fine cloth, with gilt tops, making them especially attractive. Twenty-five full-page illustrations.

Mrs. Porter's Novels in 6 Volumes

AT THE FOOT OF THE RAINBOW An idyl of central Indiana—a tale of devoted friendship and tender, self-sacrificing love—the friendship that gives freely without return, and the love that seeks first the happiness of the object.

FRECKLES Few books of recent years have sounded such a new and wholly refreshing note as that which dominates "Freckles." It is a gem, full of beauty and sentiment and well worth reading.

A GIRL OF THE LIMBERLOST This companion story to "Freckles" has repeated the striking success of that book, which, published over ten years ago, has steadily increased its tens of thousands of readers year by year. It is an exquisitely simple love story which stands for true womanhood, as did "Freckles" for pure manhood.

THE HARVESTER Mrs. Porter has lavished upon this unique romance all the wealth of nature lore and nature love from her years of patient, enthusiastic study. It is a charming blend of love, romance and the hidden delights of the woods and roads.

LADDIE, A TRUE-BLUE STORY The love story of Laddie and Pamela Pryor, the English neighbors of the Strattons, as told by Little Sister, the youngest of the Pryors, is a genuine "home-story" close to the heart of Man and of Nature.

SONG OF THE CARDINAL A beautiful and touching story of the love of a Cardinal bird for its mate with an appeal to every one who cares for true romance, as delightful for its descriptions of wild life and nature as for its tender human feelings.

This set of six uniform volumes cannot be obtained in the book stores, but can be secured only as explained in the very unusual offer below.

"FORTY PROPHETIC WONDERS"

By REV. MICHAEL BAXTER

THIS book is known to very few now living, and is remarkable for many things. Dr. Baxt was an enthusiastic student of prophecy, and had collated all the best authorities of his ow and preceding times, and they are set forth in his book with his own comment and interpretatio As an example of his perspicacity, it can be stated that among the conclusions he then reache were the following:

1907–1919, Great European wars, beginning 24 to 10 years before the end of the age, includin probably a German war or revolution. 1919, The Euphrates (or Turkish Empire) dried up—Turkish power over Judea may notably decrease about the same time. 1919–1925, Great reviv among Christians everywhere and preaching of the Advent. 1917–1919, Formation of the Ter Kingdomed Confederacy foretold in Daniel 2 : 8. 1922–1926, Jerusalem to be restored and th Temple rebuilt.

Dr. Baxter's book goes much further than this, both before and after the dates indicated. I is the most complete setting forth of Scripture prophecies to be found anywhere.

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY"

REPORT OF THE PHILADELPHIA PROPHETIC CONFERENCE

"LIGHT ON PROPHECY" links up the prophecies of the Bible with the great events of toda and shows conclusively that we are living in an age of prophetic fulfilment. When we se out several months ago to print "Light on Prophecy," we felt that it was a book which our reader would welcome. It held something that very many good people want to know. The result, however, far exceeded our expectations. "Light on Prophecy" has now passed through four large editions, and the demand is still growing. The book contains all the notable addresses on prophecy delivered at the Philadelphia Prophetic Conference, which was the most important gathering of its kind ever held in this country or perhaps in the world.

Young People's Topics for February 23

Industrial Missions in Baptist Mission Fields

B. Y. P. U. Topic. II Thess. 3 : 10-13

THE best faith leads through adoration to action. From the earliest ages the church that has prospered has been the one which set its converts to work. In the last generation a new adjunct to missionary preaching has been developed in the Industrial School. At Fukien, China, the Christian Herald Industrial Homes are making Chinese leaders from abandoned orphans. The convert on the Mission field is often poor, ignorant, either unwilling, because of family standing, to work, or unequipped to make his way in the world. The industrial school dignifies labor; by developing skill it promotes the growth of dependable character; by setting the student on a higher level of earning power, it raises the standards of living. It enables students to earn while learning, it opens the way to Christian teaching, and it helps to make the native church self-supporting.

In many mission lands, labor is looked down upon. The laborer is a menial, beneath the notice of prosperous and educated persons. This feeling does not promote Christian fellowship. But the Industrial school, by educating the head and the hand, tends to break down this wall of disdain. Character, given its opportunity, wins recognition.

The American Baptist Foreign Mission Society conducts Industrial Missions at Jorhat in Assam and at Jaro, near Iloilo, Philippine Islands. Leaders may secure special literature for this topic by addressing the Society at the Ford Building, Boston, Mass.

The Rebuilding of Europe

Epworth League Topic. Isa. 61 : 4; Mic. 4 : 3; Luke 10 : 30-37

THE Europe of today is the shattered substance of the Europe of 1914. Her political balances are torn away. Her international fellowships are disrupted and realigned. Her national faiths are needing restatement. Not a country in Europe is what it was. France is materially in ruin over some 6,000 square miles of territory, but the France of today is a national unit unknown four years ago. "Patrie" has welded jangling elements; labor and bourgeois, churchman and socialist freethinker have been fused into a mighty force by right and justice, and France lives triumphant among the graves of her sons and the dust of her cathedrals. Belgium, too, rises as the phoenix from the ashes of her sufferings. Britain sees a new world through new monocles, and is turning with a new attitude of accommodation to the settlement of her Irish and labor problems. Holland and Switzerland through the difficult path of neutrality have been strengthened, and Italy is now a first-class power, instead of the tail of Bismarck's chariot. Germany, with all lost for which she planned, and of which she boasted, prostrate before her conquerors, is being rebuilt upon the foundation of democracy. Austria will never be rebuilt, but from her scattered fragments are being assembled a new Poland, a free Bohemia, a united Jugoslavia, and a strengthened Rumania in which democracy is sweeping into full control. Russia is still in turmoil, but Russia must find a foundation upon which to raise a structure of orderly life. There is only one foundation upon which the rebuilding may rest secure, and that is the foundation of Christ. Upon him, enthroned in the hearts of millions, Europe may rise again, sure and strong to prosper and be at peace.

Christianity and the Toilers of Japan

Christian Endeavor Topic. Matt. 28 : 16-20

CHRISTIANITY is the hope of the oppressed everywhere. For centuries it has been breaking the chains of the slave. In Japan it is bringing slowly but surely a new industrial consciousness. Christianity has made better workmen by inspiring longings for better living. Non-Christian workers have profited by the better conditions inspired by Christianity, but Japan's industrial life is still secular rather than religious. Her educational system is uncompromisingly secular and Christianity is meeting skillful competition from Buddhism, which is copying Sunday sermons, Sunday school, Sunday observance, and even Christian hymns in an attempt to hold its former position in Japanese life. Some Japanese silk-weavers work from 5 A. M. to 9 P. M., the cotton mills run day and night in two shifts, hours are long and wages low, and there, as elsewhere, the cost of living rises faster than the wages. Artisans, who would be artists in America, consider $30 a month high pay. Men, women, children above school age, all are dragged into the tide of Japan's industrialism. Heavy hearts in weary bodies cry out there as elsewhere for relief, and thousands are finding in Christ not only the comforter of aching hearts but the way to better living, financial and spiritual. The humble toiler is coming to the Saviour, who never disappoints those who believe.

India's Famine Still Spreading

REPORTS received from the India Famine Field indicate that the condition of affairs is becoming very serious. The Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church has appealed to the American Red Cross for $50,000 to be applied in famine relief. The latest reports from Dr. Hume, the Chairman of the Christian Herald Committee at Bombay, which have already appeared in the Christian Herald, are being substantially corroborated from different quarters and it is hoped that his appeal may meet a very generous response.

It is said that the deaths from influenza in one village in the Ahmednagar district are taking place at the rate of 50 a day, and there are not enough well people in the village to bury the dead. The death rate in Bombay, by last accounts, was 700 a day. Lack of food has weakened the people and rendered them easy victims to the plague. An appeal has come in behalf of the Western India Mission at Kolhapur and Miraj, where the situation is represented as very necessitous.

Mother, Father and Child—Partners Three

By MAUD BURNHAM

KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN says, "How inexpressibly tiresome is the everlasting 'Don't' in some households. Don't get in the fire, don't get in the water, don't tease the baby, don't interrupt, don't contradict, don't fight with your brother, and don't worry me NOW, while in all this tirade not one word has been said about something to do."

Froebel, the founder of the kindergarten, studied to give the children something to do. If a mother's and father's demands are such that they cannot take time for study, they may at least share the interests and pleasures of their children in ways that constantly suggest themselves. By doing this they will enter into a paying partnership with their boys and girls, and later on they will have less reason to complain that the children seek other homes for diversion.

When a mother allows little daughter or son to use the tiny board and rolling pin at cooky-making time, or permits the toy broom, dustpan and brush, wash tub or little iron to serve a purpose, she is not only beginning a partnership, but laying a foundation for real usefulness later on.

Enjoying carefully restricted play with cup, pint and quart measures or even the scales, helps the child to practical knowledge. There are times when he may even play with the fireless cooker and demonstrate to his satisfaction that he can fit the right cover in the right compartment and place one utensil within another.

Fortunate the small boy or girl who is allowed to play train with chairs or use them for cages in the zoo; who may appropriate the waste-paper basket for a hen-coop; and use the clothes-basket for a boat.

One mother I know shows the spirit of partnership as she sits in her rocker, sewing. She calls the following "rocker" games:

1. The tea bell is placed on the floor. From a given spot the children roll marbles to hit the bell.

2. Mother is the kitty and the children are mice. Kitty's dish is placed back of the rocker, where Mother cannot see it, and then from a corner farther back a mouse comes on tiptoe to try to pick up the dish without kitty knowing it. If ever so little noise is heard, kitty cries, "Meow," and the mouse runs to the corner to give another mouse a turn.

3. The "groceryman" knocks at the door. Mother gives orders which are written down in make-believe. Then the goods are delivered.

4. The "iceman" calls with wooden blocks, which make fine cakes of ice.

A father has ample opportunity to be a partner with his children. There may be a chance to share in the care of animals, and carpentry and garden tools offer unlimited possibilities for cooperation.

A certain professor allowed his boys to assist in making their sand box. Those who could not use tools, smoothed the rough boards with sandpaper. These same boys helped to make a wonderful stationary horse out of a barrel.

Instead of forbidding his child to touch the typewriter, one father taught him the alphabet on it. As the boy grew up he used it for certain school work and letter writing.

Nora A. Smith suggests the keeping of a diary to help in cementing the family partnership. In this is recorded each evening the events of the day, the weather, and so on.

One of the most delightful pleasures to be shared in the home is reading aloud.

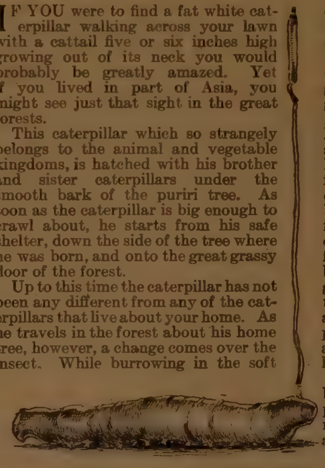
A Mission in Maine

THE Golden Rule Gospel Mission of Auburn, Me., Chas. A. Brown, pastor, reports that during the past year 1121 men have registered, averaging three days each, at the mission, making 10,089 meals (an average of 30 meals a day), and over 3000 nights' lodgings have been given. Employment has been secured for eight hundred. At the meetings over 300 have risen for prayers and nearly 100 have been converted.

A Plant With an Animal Root



IF YOU were to find a fat white caterpillar walking across your lawn with a cattail five or six inches high growing out of its neck you would probably be greatly amazed. Yet if you lived in part of Asia, you might see just that sight in the great forests.

This caterpillar which so strangely belongs to the animal and vegetable kingdoms, is hatched with his brother and sister caterpillars under the smooth bark of the puriri tree. As soon as the caterpillar is big enough to crawl about, he starts from his safe shelter, down the side of the tree where he was born, and onto the great grassy floor of the forest.

Up to this time the caterpillar has not been any different from any of the caterpillars that live about your home. As he travels in the forest about his home tree, however, a change comes over the insect. While burrowing in the soft earth for food, a peculiar seed becomes fastened in one of the folds of the caterpillar's neck, and sending its little hook-like roots into the insect's body, does not fall off, but grows, the roots going deeper and deeper, as the plant grows, and the stem shoots into the air. For some time the caterpillar goes on his way, paying no attention to the strange plant which he carries with him. When the plant stem gets to be four or five inches high, however, the caterpillar does not crawl about, but buries itself in the rich earth at the foot of a tree. From this time on the caterpillar is only the root of the plant, for it never leaves the spot where it buries itself. The plant continues to grow until it reaches a height of ten or twelve inches, first a green stem, then a rush at the top, which makes the plant look like a miniature cattail such as you find in the marshes near your home.

After a time the rush of the cattail bursts, sending out tiny feathery seed pods just as all cattails do, and this marks the end of the life of the plant, and its strange animal root.

"USED WHILE YOU SLEEP"

Established 1879

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs.

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs.

Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold.

Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp."

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights.

It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers.

For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities.

It is a protection to those exposed.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 39 years of successful use.

A view of the new Libby farm kitchen at Blue Island, Illinois

And now—a Libby farm kitchen!

Situated in the heart of thousands of acres of fertile farm lands—the largest food plant of its kind in the world

To package foods right where they grow—to capture and seal in their flavor at the moment they are freshest and finest—

That is the ideal of Libby chefs, the ideal that explains the perfection of the dishes they prepare.

That is why you will find Libby fruit kitchens out in the midst of the famous orchards of the Golden West, pineapple kitchens in Hawaii, salmon kitchens in Alaska. That is why Libby kitchens for the packaging of meats are in Chicago, where America's finest meat-producing animals are sent to be dressed.

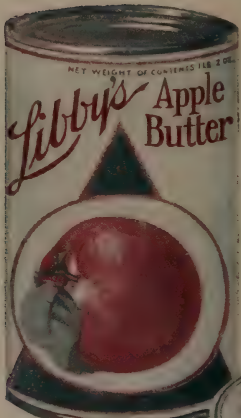
And now comes this newest Libby kitchen—situated at Blue Island, Illinois, in the heart of thousands of acres of some of the richest farm land in the United States.

An airy, sunlit building of concrete, brick and glass, spotlessly clean and sanitary, and supplied with the most modern equipment for the scientific preparation of foods. It is a huge structure with over a half million square feet of floor space—the largest food plant of its kind in the world. Transportation facilities are unusual, the plant having a ready outlet over practically every important railroad out of Chicago.

At this plant Libby chefs prepare and package a great variety of foods, among them salad dressing, mustard, apple butter, jellies, pickles, olives, sauerkraut, pork and beans, and tomato products.

We should especially like to have you try Libby's Apple Butter—an unusually tempting delight as Libby chefs prepare it. Your grocer has it or will gladly get it for you.

Libby, McNeill & Libby, 1002 Welfare Bldg., Chicago



Apple butter! Rich, thick, creamy apple butter! How long has it been since you have enjoyed it? The moment you catch the spicy fragrance of Libby's Apple Butter, the moment you taste it, you will say it is the work of master chefs. Order a package today—see how the Libby ideal of flavor has improved this good old-fashioned dish

The Simple Way~

The easy, practical way to polish and preserve finished surfaces is with Johnson's Prepared Wax and a cloth—you don't need brushes, sprays or mops of any kind. Simply apply the wax with a cloth and then polish with a dry cloth—very little rubbing is required to produce an exquisite, lustrous polish of great beauty and durability.

Johnson's Prepared Wax is not only a polish but a wonderful preservative—it forms a thin, protecting film over the finish, similar to the service rendered by a piece of plate glass over a desk, table or dresser-top.

Johnson's Prepared Wax contains no oil, consequently it never becomes soft and sticky in the hottest weather or from the heat of the body—it does not gather dust and dirt or show finger prints.

JOHNSON'S ~Liquid and Paste
PREPARED WAX

Johnson's Prepared Wax is made in Paste, liquid and powdered form. We recommend the Liquid Wax for polishing furniture, woodwork and automobiles. Use the Paste Wax for polishing floors of all kinds—wood, linoleum and tile. Johnson's Powdered Wax puts any floor in perfect condition for dancing.

Has the soft-coal soot given your furniture and woodwork a dull, grimy appearance? Try the magic of Johnson's Prepared Wax—it cleans and polishes in one operation.

A Dust-Proof Auto Polish

Auto owners will find Johnson's Liquid Wax the most satisfactory polish for their cars. It sheds water and dust and makes a "wash" last twice as long. It adds years to the life of automobile varnish. Write for our booklet on Keeping Cars Young—it's free.

INDIA'S CALL

The Great Famine Now Affects 100,000,000 of the Population

REV. A. P. FRANKLIN, of the Swedish Mission to the Bhils, now in this country on furlough, has furnished to the Christian Herald important information concerning the extent he great famine and the number of those involved sufferers. Dr. Franklin, while visiting the Christi Herald offices in the Bible House, made the foling statement:

I have consulted with missionaries regarding the affected. The missionaries from the Punjab and dras have not heard of any serious conditions in r fields. The rainfall has been scanty and scarcity ts, but not actual famine conditions. It must refore be the greater part of Bombay Presidency, ar and Central India Agency that are affected. m government reports it is safe to infer, however, t the whole of India is more or less involved. In e districts, like Punjab, Bengal and Madras, irriion will, of course, greatly help to mitigate the ering. The greatest need at present seems to be Bombay Presidency and Berar. The missions king in this area are: The American Board, the erican Methodist Mission, the Christian and Misary Alliance, the Swedish Alliance, the Dunkard thren, the Canadian Presbyterian, the Church ssionary Society of Great Britain, the Irish Preserian, and the Salvation Army.

"We may estimate that a population of 100,000,000 nvolved, or approximately one-third of the entire pulation of India, which, according to the last cen-, was 320,000,000. Of the 100,000,000 in the ected districts, somewhere between one-third and -fourth are in touch with the missions.

"My own mission work is under the Swedish Alli- ce. Scattered over the hills and valleys on the tpura Mountains in western India lives an intering old race of people, called Bhils. They are now or and counted among the low castes but have own better days in years gone by, when they were lords and land-holders of the greater parts of jputana, Mewar, Panch Mahals and Khandesh, ore the Aryan and Mohammedan invasions. As y were not strong enough to defend themselves ainst these invaders, they were forced into the gles and mountain fastnesses, where for generans they have merely eked out a living. Famine s again and again swept over their territory exact- heavy tolls of life. Living far away from roads d lines of communication, they are always the rdest hit when famine comes.

"In the year 1904, at the request of a British offil, the Swedish Alliance Mission started work among the Bhils in the very heart of their mountain fastnesses in West Khandesh. Three years had then elapsed since the horrible famine of 1900, when two-thirds of the population were swept away; but the country had by no means recovered from the dreadful ordeal. Many villages were entirely desolate; the fields were overgrown with thorns and grass, the houses burned by the yearly forest fires, and only a few charred poles remained to remind one of what had been. Many an hour I have sat round the campfires listening to the most touching tales of how father and mother, children, relatives and neighbors succumbed to the pangs of hunger, and sometimes my tears have mingled with theirs, as the tragic facts of the famine have been related to me on the spots where they happened.

"WITH the assistance of British officials, a village called Mandulwar was selected for our first mission station. I was well received by the Bhils from the very start. They helped me to erect a small grass hut, and on the second day a Bible class was started. The people flocked around me to listen to the Gospel story. About a hundred men came twice a day for instruction, and in a few months eighteen men had decided for Christ and were baptized. A stir was created in the whole district, and the people flocked to me for instruction. The work grew, more workers came to the field, one mission station after another was built, churches and schoolhouses were erected, and now a community of about eight hundred souls has been gathered into the fold of the Christian Church.

"The British government always stood by us in the work, giving us land and lumber free for churches and schoolhouses and grants in aid of the schools. In social and practical work, farming, irrigation and roadbuilding the government has also given us great support, and the officials have on several occasions expressed their approval and gratitude for the work done among the Bhils.

"A well organized work has thus been established, and we had great hopes for the future—but the famine is again over the land, and consequently disorganization of the whole work is threatened. If we cannot organize relief work in some way, the Christians will have to go somewhere else to find relief and thus be scattered among the heathen. The Christians are now living on grass-seeds, and even for that they will soon have to substitute roots and leaves from the jungle. A Bhil dies hard. They are a people that have a mind to live, and during the last fifteen years the population doubled in our district; but it will be reduced to half or one-third, if speedy help does not arrive.

"The near future looks much more gloomy than in the last great famine. Some of the people already look like skeletons. They come to the mission stations and fall down on the ground before the missionaries pleading for help. 'Give us bread, or let us die at your door,' is their cry. At one of our mission stations already twenty-two children have been placed at the mercy of the missionaries, and the same story comes from the others. Of these children many come from Christian homes, where the parents have died of influenza, and others come from heathen homes. In one village alone fifty families died, and the children were lying out in the streets crying themselves to death.

"Can you wonder that we appeal for help? It would take a heart of stone not to do it. We want to save as many as possible, but let us specially remember the little ones. Two dollars a month will support an orphan. Let us give the children a chance to grow up in our Christian schools and learn about the Saviour, who said: 'Suffer little children to come unto me.' Will America not listen to their cry, and send its gifts to feed them, and do it now? Our mission will cooperate with the already established Christian Herald Famine Relief Committee in Bombay, and your gifts through this Committee will be greatly appreciated."

A great Famine Relief public meeting was held in Bombay in December at the call of the government officials, for the purpose of organizing relief measures. Lord Willingdon was chairman, and among the speakers were many of the native notables, high officials and others, including the Lord Bishop of Bombay. An appeal for help was officially authorized, and a subscription fund started.

ACCORDING to the latest reports, however, the famine has spread simultaneously in many parts of India since that meeting was held, and now extends over a very large area of the country, from the hill districts of the north to central India and east and west. In many districts, the population, already weakened by influenza, which is epidemic, are falling easy victims, and the mortality rate is constantly rising.

The Christian Herald Relief Committee at Bombay, of which Rev. R. A. Hume is chairman, is the pioneer missionary organization at work among the sufferers. The needs of its field, which reaches far beyond the limits of the presidency, are constantly growing, and it is hoped that ample means will be quickly placed at the committee's disposal. India's Provinces Where Famine Now Rages

Famine-Ravaged India

The territory shown here is the part of India most severely affected by famine, where 100,000,000 people await our succor. Twice since March slight rains have encouraged planting. Each time the plants have withered before the tender shoots were large enough for fodder.

Records in thirty-nine of the forty weather stations in India show shortages of from 5 to 57 inches under normal rainfall.

The World's Greatest Revenue Bill

NEVER in history has a nation of free men proposed to tax itself in twelve months to the extent which is represented in the War Revenue Bill agreed upon in conference between the two Houses of Congress and presented to both Houses on February 6. As forecast in previous weeks this bill provides increased income taxes, increases the War Profit tax, reduces letter postage, leaves magazine postage untouched, and levies special taxes which leave hardly an individual untouched. The luxury taxes which have been opposed from one end of the nation to the other were included in the final draft of the bill, but it was expected that later in the session these taxes would be eliminated and that a new attempt would be made by the Senate to repeal the zone postage rates on second-class matter. The principal features of the bill are as follows:

INCOME TAX

Normal tax on incomes: For 1918, 12 per cent. of net income in excess of authorized credits; in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States the rate of the first $4000, shall be 6 per cent. For each year thereafter, 8 per cent.; in the case of a citizen or resident, 4 per cent. A surtax of 1 per cent. of income from $5000 to $6000; 2 per cent. on $6000 to $8000; 3 per cent. on $8000 to $10,000; rising to 65 per cent.; on incomes over $1,000,000.

Gross income includes salaries of all kinds, including those of the President and all other officials, but does not include life insurance, annuities, value of gifts or bequests (incomes from such, however, are taxed), incomes from obligations of the United States, the states, territories, or political divisions thereof, securities of Federal Farm Loan Act of 1916, or bonds of the War Finance Corporation, incomes of foreign governments in the United States, accident or health insurance or damages, incomes of political divisions of the United States, and military salaries up to $3500.

Deductions permitted are expenses of carrying on business; including salaries; interest on indebtedness; taxes except income, war profits, and excess profit taxes; losses in trade or business; worthless debts; loss by wear and tear of property used in business; depletion and depreciation of mines, oil and gas wells, and timber; contributions to charitable, scientific or educational corporations. At the time of filing returns for 1918 a tax payer may file claims to abatement based on the fact that he has sustained substantial loss.

No deduction will be allowed for personal or family living expenses, or amounts paid for new buildings or improvements, or restorations of property, or premiums paid on life insurance policy of employees or other interested person when tax payer is directly or indirectly a beneficiary. In case of a single person an exemption of $1000, or in case of head of family or married person, $2000. Husband and wife to receive one personal exemption of $2000 and $200 for each dependent person other than husband or wife under 18 years, or incapable of self-support.

Partners are responsible in their individual capacity only.

Every single person or married person not living with husband or wife with income of $1000 or over, or every married person living with husband or wife with income of $2000 or over shall make under oath a return of gross income with deductions and credits. If a tax payer is unable to make his own return it shall be made by a duly authorized agent or guardian. Every partnership shall make a similar return.

Every fiduciary (except receivers in possession of part only of property of an individual) shall make under oath a return for the individual or corporation for which he acts.

Returns shall be made on or before the 15th day of the third month after close of the fiscal year, or if the return is made on the basis of the calendar year, the return shall be made on or before March 15. The commissioner may grant a reasonable extension of time whenever good cause exists, no extension shall be for more than six months.

If the collector believes the income to be understated, he shall require taxpayers to show cause why amount should not be increased or on proof may increase the same.

CORPORATION TAX

Corporations in 1918 shall pay 12 per cent. of net income in excess of credits provided; for each calendar year thereafter 10 per cent.

Labor, agricultural or horticultural organizations, mutual savings banks not having a capital stock represented by shares. Fraternal beneficiary societies are exempt from tax; also building and loan associations, cemetery companies operated exclusively for their members, religious, charitable, scientific and educational societies and all other societies not operated for profit.

Taxes shall be paid in 4 equal instalments—1st at time of filing return; 2nd, 15th day of 3rd month; 3rd, 15th day of 6th month; 4th, 15th day of 9th month. Tax may be paid in full at once if desired.

ECTED BY LAW

ON THE morning of March 14, 1903, the late Theodore Roosevelt, then President of the United States, sat at his desk, and after deliberation signed a paper that he had been studying. His signature started the greatest movement toward bird conservation that has ever been known, and he lived long enough to see a great colony of birds breeding on the Florida land he ordered set aside for that purpose; and what is more, he saw the one original reservation grow year by year, until at the time of his death there were seventy- Federal bird reservations, a treaty with Canada tecting migratory birds, also a Federal law, making Federal land, lighthouses, national parks and ional cemeteries places where the feathered folk ht live free from the molesting hand of the hunter.

ust why this movement was necessary can be ex- ined in a short space. Fifty years ago the United tes was decidedly small as to population and lthy as to animal life. Birds lived in every patch woodland, in the thickets along the country roads, the fields. Farming was conducted on a small le, many of the farms being limited to the amount land that one household could cultivate. Cities e small, and far distanced. The birds prospered.

As the country has grown day by day, as the use of m machinery has reached out over the fields and de our farms tracts of land embracing thousands acres, the natural haunts of the birds have disap- red. And yet the birds have an economic as well a pictorial value.

'Practically every tillable foot of land in the state under cultivation," the Chief Game Warden of a at corn state reported recently, "and I find that ny of the small lakes and marshes, the natural ding and resting grounds of the birds, are disap- ring. If we do not establish at least one game serve in each county there is a possibility that the ds and small wild life will be seriously depleted."

ANOTHER serious factor in the possible depletion of bird life was the possibility that without pper laws of protection the hunter would soon kill several of the species. This does not seem possible the average thinker, yet as a definite example can cited the wild pigeon.

Fifty years ago the wild pigeon was more common an any other wild bird, yet 1919 finds these native merican birds as extinct as the dodo. Wild pigeons re fairly large, graceful and beautiful. They may ve done some small damage to the crops, but their ief food was wild fruit, berries, etc., and thin- elled nuts. If they went into the fields, it was to k about in the stubble after the fields were cut. t for some reason the farmer's boy chose to call em pests, and to kill them accordingly. Incidentally, the wild pigeon was good to eat, and the butcher in the nearest town would buy all he could get. Sometimes hundreds of these birds were killed by a party of four or five hunters or trappers. There were some who cried shame at the slaughter, but not many, and from 1860 to 1870 the birds began to disappear. A series of exceptionally cold winters are supposed to have helped with the destruction, but no matter the cause the country suddenly discovered that one of the most beautiful of the native American birds was almost extinct. The various Zoological parks had some of the birds in their cages, but naturalists could find none living in their native breeding-places.

The awakening had come too late. The birds did not thrive in captivity,—the last one died in a cage in Cincinnati four or five years ago—and in spite of the reward of $1,500 offered for the discovery of a pair of wild pigeons, none has ever been found. The wild pigeons of America are gone.

Other birds would have disappeared in the same way. Seagulls, the natural scavengers of our coast, were threatened with extinction by plume hunters, so were the beautiful egrets which are killed at nesting time for their feathers—the aigrette, which the bird does not wear at other times—and the heath hen of the Massachusetts coast. In the case of the heath hen there is still a question as to whether this bird can be saved, for there were only a few left when the Audubon Society was able to obtain a preserve at Martha's Vineyard, and by careful protection to increase the number of these birds so that the danger of extinction might be passed. The experiment has been fairly successful, and the authorities in charge are hopeful.

BIRD conservation is a national duty. Theodore Roosevelt, one of the greatest Americans, leaves behind him a lasting memorial in the Federal reservations that he founded, and each of us, in an humble way, can carry on the work.

The natural question arising from the reading of this article is: "How can I do my share?" Very easily. Every window-box, garden, or estate where birds are encouraged to live and are protected is another link in the great chain of bird reservations. All birds are insect-destroyers —the wren, the bluebird, the woodpecker, etc., etc.,—and they will repay for any damage they do by their beauty and their insect-killing proclivities. If you can't afford a bird bath, put out a shallow basin of water; all birds like to bathe. Feed the birds in winter; put a bird-house in the trees, and instil in the growing children the idea that it is their duty to protect the feathered folk.

SUCH were conditions some thirty years ago. There were various bird societies, but they were not far-reaching in their activities and had little authority which they could use to protect the feathered folk.

At various times, even as far back as 1858, naturalists had written of the birds of Florida and their need of protection, especially of the brown pelicans of the Indian River. Florida, because of its climate, its natural marshes and lakes, has, like Louisiana, always been a favorite wintering-place for migratory birds, as well as the waterfowl that made the states their home. In 1901 an effort was first made to protect the famous Pelican Island with its colony of brown pelicans, and as a result state protection was offered to all non-game birds. Pelican Island was surveyed, and then came the suggestion that it might be a Federal reservation. There was no real authority for such an act, but the General Land Office prepared the order, it was approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and signed by the President. Since that time other tracts of land in various parts of the United States have been dedicated to the conservation of bird life. There are ten Federal reservations in Florida, the same number in the state of Washington, while Alaska and Louisiana have about an equal number. Practically all of the states bordering on the Gulf of Mexico have Federal reservations, and many of the Mid-Western states have several. There is no Federal reservation in any of the original thirteen states.
